She should train her daughter to be the best woman possible; to take the highest place she can in the toble company of men and women who are seeking to be and to make others divine. When every power ale has is trained for the highest achievement, home, world and husband will share in her success and her joy. Every woman's bread should be won by her in one way or another. To eat bread in order to win bread in order to eat more bread in order to win bread in order to eat more bread in order to win bread in order to eat more bread in order to win bread in order to eat more bread in order to win bread in order to eat more bread in order to win bread in order to eat more bread in order to win bread in order to eat more bread in order to win more bread. How small the circle this path makes. It is not worth while for a human being to labor simply for enting; yet that is just what roany do. The bread winning should be but an incident. Would it be worth while to feed an engine with coal if it were to do nothing but carry itself to the coal yard to get its own coal? Let there be some purpose in living, some noble thing to be done, and the bread winning be but a part of the preparation for that good work. and life becomes worth living. Every girl should be inspired with a great desire to do something toward lifting the world out of its ignorance, its sorrow, its crime. She should be trained to do the thing that is nearest her in the way that will best help on the great work, and then all lesser things will adjust themselves. Home and society will feel the influence of a great soal, and she will win not only her bread but the love of husband and children. She should train her daughter to be the be the love of husband and children.

If it wise for women to close their houses during the sammer mostly, leaving their hosbands and note to the mercies of close and restaurants? Would it not be well, based of draping the mirrors, pictures and furniture with old sheets, and sending the valuables to a storage house, to cover the floors and furniture with cool lines and the ornaments and pictures with white messaito neiting and leaves the most trusty servant in charge. Make of the house an attractive place for the most of their families where they may read, and belie, and be comformable out of working bound? And the home thoose all seminor, might the mother on occasionally raines to cheer with the presence those whose latters render her outlog possible?

A HUSBAND.

Is it wise to leave bushand and sons to the gloom of a dismantledanstuncared-for house? Who can ask such a question? A thousand times no! It may happen that for the sake of an alling baby or delicate children father and mother will sacrifice their own comfort in the hope that country air may restore health to the lored one. But for the pleasures of summer festivities at a watering place, no true wife and mother, or loving daughter or sister, would consent to leave bushand and son, father and brother, to the loneliness and discomfort of a closed house. Sometimes it is comfort of a closed house. Sometimes it is true a man gets enough from his Saturday and Sanday onting to atone for the discomfort of the mid-week in town, and chooses to have his the mid-week in town, and chooses to have his home transferred to the country though he can spend only a portion of his time there. We are all trying to live on too complicated a scale, and this problem of the summer can only be solved when we put our entire mode of living on a more rational plane. Men may spare a little more time from business when it cous less to keep up an establishment, and momen will be less wearied with the winter's burden of social and household cares and be better able to enjoy a rational summer and be better able to enjoy a rational summer and can give greater comfort to their families. We all try to do too prach, and fail to get and give the greatest joy in living.

Is it not improvibe that a man should decline social invisations that do not include his wife; and is it so in the worst possible form for women of fashion to invite popular resisterities, authors, musicians, etc., with our technique their wives?

C. B.

A man who would receive and accept an invitation to a company in which women were included, when his own wife was not invited, certainly would lack some important elements of manliness; and a woman who invites a married man without his wife, stultifies herself, for she offers an insult to berself as a woman. It must be admitted that some persons who pride themselves on "good form" are guilty of giving and accepting invitations which distinctly ignore the fact of the existence of a wife, but it comes from a weak imitation of foreign manners which have no foundation in good morals, and partakes of the barbarous life of the countries where the pasha goes abroad and the women remain in the haren.

DEEP down in the heart of every woman there is a spice of romance, and as the goes on the memory of former ideals sometimes dit before our molads in manabiliting contrast to present restilities. We do not admit to ourselves that we are dauppointed—offentimes we have all that we once hoped for, or dreamed of—only, somebow, distance then lend nechanimes.

Would it not be well if we were to try occasionally to see the present as it would have appeared to us viewed with the eyes of eigheees?

Could anything have then seemed more romantle, more ideal, than to be married to our own particular "John"—John seems to have become the generic same for husbands, as likely for canaries—to be called Mandama by two or three of "the lovelies children" in the world;" to be the materies of a pretty boste, and to have a position "that maketh not estimated?" Many of us have all this, and yet feel that life thatm-dream and commonplace. Many of us readine our "castles in Spain," only we do not recognize them when they come. We are then reaching out toward accombining eds.

Unlappily there is a class of women to whom life has brought disappointment in their tenderest and most sensitive relations, but to meat American wives falls is railer allos.

One of these unfortunates once said, not thinking how much her words revealed: "Our disis fall off their polessias, but there is only one thing to do—pick up the pieces and try to go on worshiping as before." To which another lady replied: "There are few such job worthy of pedestals. I got minute a niche, where I can see only the best side!" Such philosoppy is like that of the old Frenchman who said that he always put on manuflying glasses when he also after the these days they will seem transfigured! "Viceo Hugo says "Espaily paradise, the parents young, the children sensit," but where colors has evidently tearned the sacrate of how on the life from a picture of the parents of summer and interesting in conversation at in the day of his greatest infamation, and have a possible at life will in

The death of a loved one was chreated by a picture of an angel standing by an open form, copied probably from an Easter card, on which was written, as though out in the rock, Longfellow's boundful lines: "There is no death, what seems to be transition."

A floropean tour next offered endiest opportunities for pretty sketches.

A thread of explanation can through the whole, chiefly composed of say becified quotations, and the book closed with the same thought with which it began, quoting Longfellow again:

"The connection wild weather, come size of course most,"

Then come the wild weather, come sleet or come anow, We'll stand by each other however it blow — Jey, pleasare, or sickness or sorrow or pain Stadi be to our true love as tinks to the chain."

Veritable antique brocade was stretched over the cover, and the edges bound in turnished thesel braid. The family control-arms was embroidered likewise in tamulated licasel thread in the center, and the effect was most artistic.

The owner said: "I commend the idea to the bulkation of other wives. I sever knew how bleal us; life was

MRS. BURTON KINGSGAND.

Everything which serves to emphasize home life is of great value, and such memor-ials of a happy past serve to easure a happy present and future. I lately had the privilege of visiting a house where the very walls are covered with the tokens of the progress of love in the home. Grandparents, parents, children and greats are all as it were photochildren and guests are all, as it were, photochiefers and guests are all, as it were, proco-graphed in unexpected nooks and corners. Mottoes which have given inspiration in the life of each member of the family are ingen-iously woven into the decorations, and the atmosphere of the home is filled with the sweet-ness and the charm which comes from perfect ness and the charm which comes from persect congeniality. Not a little of the joy which is so abundant that it overflows into the lives of neighbors and friends is due to the "point of view" from which each one—father, mother, son, daughter—has looked at the other. The best side of the dear one has been kept in alght.

D<sup>0</sup> you believe that it is inconsistent in the life of a church member to play cards—not for money, but upon social evenings at the houses of friends, etc. ? I am a mether of boys and girls, and it is a difficult question for me to decide whether I shall allow my children as they grow up to play cards, or whether I shall problem it.

The question of card playing is a difficult ne. Not only in the case of individuals is it one. Not only in the case of individuals is it a question, but social organizations find it not easy to decide. Some clubs exclude cards altogether; others admit them with restrictions. The temptation to gambling, beginning in very small ways, seems to attach itself to cards especially, and young people find it difficult to enjoy the game without introducing something, however trifling, to be won. If children could grow up happily, in an atmosphere where the difficulty would not be presented to them, if there was so much else in the way of recreation that cards were not thought of. of recreation that cards were not thought of, that would be the happiest condition. But I should hesitate to prohibit the use of cards lest children be tempted to do what I had forbidden them to do, and deceit be added to other misfortunes connected with such a method of family government. method of family government.

M CCH is written in regard to children's duties to parents' duties to children. But I have waited long to see something to regard to children's duties to aged grandparents. I have beged that Miss Ashmore would take to ber girls upon the subject, or Dr. Talinage case his magical pen to defend their rights. It is the neglect of which I would econopiant. Grandfina is booked upon as a ber to their happiness; kept in the dark in regard to their plans and pleasures. If she is slightly deed to much the easier, and so she size day after day without hearing a vaice, became nobady will take the pains to speak above an ordinary tone.

Perhaps there are jests and laughter going on, and now and then a faint sound of their mirrit comes to her deadened ease like an each of other days, and she seen the admissive flowers of her children's children and sake of them what the sport is all about, and receives for an answer: "Nothing much." Perhaps the sake some member of the family where they shapes to be going, and they should not interfere with the household plans and pleasures if granding was to share in them; but the is situs entirely out of their busy, shill life, and also like one forestand, waithing the dear ones with longing eyes, wondering of what they are talking, or why this or that is being done, who in the expected goest, etc., all of which is no secret, only no one will take the trouble to say a few words of explanation, in a little londer tone, to granding.

This is no exagerated case. One of the dearest old ladies I know is treated in this manner day after day; still she effect particular and foreithes and their particular and foreithes and their mirrit complished passes the rips, only once I saw the great team roll dates be writted and the supplied, but her beart is breaking of foreithress and decidation. Never a word of conjusted passes her lips, only once I saw the great team roll dates be writted the team of all they don't know." No, they do not know, it hinks, or they would never being pain to that gentle, lovi

How much these young people are losing! The presence of the aged is a blessing in the home; if the blessing is not taken it is likely to be remembered with grief when the time comes for those who are now young to sit in the corner and "look on."

I AM a girl, young and unmarried. Of everse, I might —any girl can marry some one, but I have never cared to marry just for the sake of marrying. Lots of girls do, and are miserable ever afterward, while I am very happy so I am. However, I have no desire to go through life a mere society woman. I want to earn my own living. I have always longed to make morey. But how to do it, that is the question that he perpetuig me. I can sing play and rectire—all shirly well, and as I have a good education, I sught teach, but my parents would effect to my bying away from home as march when it is not necessary. What I long to do it—write. It is work that I love, and I can certainly do it better than anything else. It is no trocke to me, and I have already been alriy secreesful at it. At school I had no trouble in carrying off all the necials for composition, and besides have now several obside peters, one of them from loss of the most preminent duly papers in the United States. This sounds like blowing my own tranget, but before me I do not while not that, I only wish you to understand my case. Share I left school I have accomplished nothing more starding than to conduct a department in a weekly paper. That he't much is it? But it is at least read. Now, what I want to do to untile stories. I would certainly blosh for myself if I rould not write something pure and better than some of the staff that I see published. Yet the people who write this "trach" must get something for it, do they not? or are they writing for glovy? I what that people who write this "trach" must get something for it, do they not? or are they writing for glovy? I what that people who write this "trach" must get something for it, do they not? or are they writing for glovy? I what that people who will be they are more than the waste backet, and am afraid that if I should send one of my stories to an either own life among the stories and the this matter I will be graveful.

You are only one of thousands who long Tot are only one of thousands who long to write stories and have them paid for liberally. And you might, I should think, write quite as good stories as many that are printed and read and paid for. But, my dear girl, that is a very poor ambition. Have you any wish to cheer the lonely, to encourage the despairing, to stir the title to noble deeds? Do we went to tall more and warms what will you want to tell men and women what will give them power to achieve and patience to endure? Have you anything to say worth say-ing? If you have, say it and send it to some periodical which seems to you a good medium for your communications with the world of readers. Accept the lessons of the waste bas-ket and the polite notes of declination, realizing that editors are not wholly wanting in wisdom, and can sometimes see faults in your writing which are invisible to you. Try several different publications; what is not at all suitable for one may be just fitted to another. So you may expend a little money in postage to a very good purpose and your precious story may find a welcome after having been more than once turned away from the editorial sanctum. Having been inside that Sphinx-like place, let me tell you in confidence that it makes a great difference in the reception of a manuscript whether it is legibly written or not, and whether the author's address is distinctly given.

DUTIES OF THE WAITRESS

A LTHOUGH every housekeeper may have some methods peculiarly her own in the matter of waiting upon the table, still there are some customs that are almost universal in retined households.

there are some customs that are almost universal in retined households.

If the water has not already been poured, the waitress pours it as soon as the guests sit down at the table. If there be raw oysters, they should be served first. Usually they are arranged on the plates, and placed at each person's seat before the guests come in.

When the oyster plates have been removed, the soup tureen and hot soup plates are placed before the hostess. The waitress lifts the cover off the tureen, inverting it at once, that no drops of steam shall fall from it, and carries it from the room. The hostess puts a ladleful of soup into each plate and hands it to the waitress, who places it before the guests, going in every case to the left-hand side. Some hostesses always serve the ladies first, while others serve the guests in rotation.

The neat is set before the host, the vegetables being placed before the hostess or on the sideboard, as one chooses. The waitress passes each plate as the bost hands it to her. She then passes vegetables, bread, sauce, etc.

The salad is to be served by the hostess. After that the table is brushed and the dessert is brought in and placed before the hostess. The coffee follows. If fruit be served it is passed before the coffee.

Finger bowls are brought in after the made dessert has been served. A dainty doily is spread on a dessert plate and the finger bowl placed on this. The bowl should be about one-quarter full of water. Each guest lifts the bowl and doily from the plate and places them at the left-hand side. The doily is never to be used to give the fineers. to be used to wipe the fingers.

A good waitress will not pile one dish upon another when removing them from the table. She should be provided with a tray for all the smaller dishes, and should remove the plates one or two at a time.

SEATING ONE'S GUESTS AT DINNER

M ANY inquiries come as to how the guests should be scated at dinner. The host lends the way to the dining-room, offering his arm to the oldest haly or the greatest stranger, unless it happens that the dinner is given for one lady in particular, in which case she, as the guest of honor, is taken in by the host, and sented at his right. The other guests follow, each contlemns giving his arm to the follow, each gentleman giving his arm to the lady he is to take in. The hostess follows last with the oldest gentleman or the greatest atranger, who is then sented at her right.

IS IT PROPER TO KEEP THE TABLE SET?

W HETHER or not it is right to keep the table set all the time in a private house is a question that has troubled one of my correspondents. It is not considered proper. After each meal clear the table, brush the cloth and fold it carefully; then put on a heavy colored cloth. If the table be of handsomely-finished wood it may be left bare. It often hancers, that a housekeeper who somely-finished wood it may be left tare.

It often happens that a housekeeper who does her own work or one who has a large family and keeps but one servant, finds it more convenient to have her table set after each meal. If the dining-room be used only for its legistimate purpose there can be no objection to this, if the room be kept closed and dark until meal time. The same rules cannot apply both to the woman who does her own work, or hus but one servant, and the woman work, or has but one servant, and the woman who keeps many servants. There is one thing which never should be done by anybody; tumblers and plates should not be turned up-

SERVING MEALS WITHOUT A SERVANT

A HOUSEKEEPER who keeps no servant asks how to serve desserts; how to serve the other dishes at dinner; what comes after the outroeal or the mush at breakfast; when to pour the coffee; and if the plates should be distributed on the table or placed beside the carrier? beside the carrer?

The conditions are so different in different families that no arbitrary rules can be given The conditions are so different in different families that no arbitrary rules can be given for these things, but here are a few suggestions which may be helpful: Have everything ready in the kitchen to put on the table without delay, and place the dishes where they will keep hot until wanted. Eggs in any form must, of course, be served as soon as cooked; therefore they must be timed very carefully. Put the mush on the table at your own place and serve it in saucers or little dishes that come for that purpose. Anyone who does not est mush or fruit may decline it, and wait for the next course. After the mush has been served, remove the dishes, and place the rest of the breakfast on the table. The plates should be hot and be plade before or at oneside of the curver. While be is serving, poor the coffee. When there is another member of the family who can put the second course on the table, the housekeeper should be relieved of this part of the work. It is hard on a woman not only to have to prepare the breakfast, but also to arise from the table, bring in the second course and serve this, as she often must, since, as a rule, men are in a harry in the morning and cannot assist their wives in serving the breakfast.

BE CHEERFUL AT BREAKFAST

BE CHEERFUL AT BREAKFAST

If often happens that the housekeeper must serve everything, besides pouring the coffee. The best a woman can do under these circumstances is to keep calm, cook and serve a beatthful and plain breakfast as cheerfully and well as possible, forgetting herself until her family is served and rendy for the day's work. After this, if she be a wise woman, she will cut her own breakfast showly, resting body and mind, that she may be prepared for the work of the day. Few women realize how much influence this first meal has upon the members of their household.

how much influence this first ment has upon the members of their bousehold.

The woman who does her own work, if she be wise, will not often serve more than two courses for dinner. Have the dessert dishes all ready on the sideboard or a side table. Remove the dinner plates, vegetables and meat dishes, butter plates, etc., and then brush the table, if there be any crumts upon it; then put on the dessert. If there be children in the family they can be truined to change the plates and bring in the other dishes. It is an educating and refining experience for them.

The terms "tray cloths" and "carving cloths" are applied to the same articles, which are intended to be spread on the trays from which coffee or ten is served when taken to the which coffee or tea is served when taken to the parloc or piazza. When meals are taken to an invalid's room the tray is covered with one of these cloths. On the dinner table they are placed over the tablecloth at the carver's place. Por breakfast, luncheon and tea they are spread at the mistress's end of the table, and aprend at the mistress's end of the table, and the dishes for ten, coffee or chocolate are ar-ranged upon them, as they used to be arrang-ed in old times, when a silver or enameled tray was used for this purpose.

These tray cloths come in all sizes and de-signs. The most satisfactory kind are the fine damask or linen, hemstitched, and, if one can afford it, embroidered in white or some delicate shade of washable silk.

VALUE OF A DROP OF OIL

VALUE OF A DROP OF OIL

EVERY honsekeeper knows how annoying it is to have the hinges of the doors squeak, and the locks and holts refuse to move unless great force be used. Many do not realize that a few drops of oil will, as a rule, remedy these annoyances. First spread a newspaper on that part of the floor over which the hinges swing. Now, with the sewing-machine oil can, oil the hinges thoroughly, and then swing the door back and forth until it moves without noise. Wipe the hinges, but let the paper remain for a few hours, to guard against the possible dripping of oil. For locks and boits, guard the floor in the same manner. Oil them thoroughly, working them until they will move with ease. The egg-bester and the loc-cream freezer should be oiled in the same manner.

TO CLEAN CHAMOIS SKINS

CHAMOIS skins that have been used for CHAMOIS skins that have been used for cleaning silver, brass, etc., can be made as soft and clean as new by following these directions: Put six tablespoonfuls of bouse-bold ammonia into a bowl with a quart of repid water. Let the chamois skin sonk in this water for one hour. Work it about with a spoon, pressing out as much of the dirt as possible; then lift it into a large basin of tepid water, and rub well with the hands. Rinse in fresh waters until clean, then dry in the shade. When dry rub between the hands. Chamois juckets can be washed in the same manner, except that there should be two quarts of water jackets can be washed in the same manner, ex-cept that there should be two quarts of water to the six tablespoonfuls of ammonia. Pull-into shape before drying.

If you find gresse spots on wall paper, put powdered French chalk, wet with cold water, over the places, and let it remain for twelve hours or more. When you brush off the chalk, if the grease spots have not disap-peared, put on more chalk, place a piece of course brown paper or blotting paper on this, and press for a few minutes with a warm flat-iron.

CLEANING WHITE RUGS

MANY inquiries come to me as to how to clean white goatskin rugs. They can be cleaned by washing, or with naphtha.

Wet a small part of the rug with naphtha, and rub with a soft cloth until that space is clean; then clean another place, continuing until the entire rug has been treated in this way. Hang in the air until the odor has disappeared. Take care that no gas is lit in the room while the naphtha is being used.

To wash the rug, put into a tub about four gallons of tepid water and half a pint of household ammonia. Let the rug soak in this for about half an hour, sopping it up and down in the water frequently. Rinse in several tepid waters, and hang on the line to dry; if possible, in a shady place. Select a windy dry for this work. Even with the greatest care the skin will become hard when washed. Rubbing it between the hands tends to soften it; or, it may be folded, lengthwise, the fur side in, and then be passed through the clothes-wringer several times. This, of course, should be done only when the rug is dry.

TWO WAYS TO CARCH SURS.

TWO WAYS TO CATCH FLIES

Two ways to Catch flies

A Mong the many questions that have come to me is one in regard to the making of sticky fly paper. Such paper is easily prepared. Put into a sancepan one pint of molasses, half a pint of linaced oil and one pound of rosin. Cook for thirty-five minutes after the mixture begins to boil, and stir frequently. Spread this very thinly on common brown paper, and spread another sheet of paper on the first one. Continue laying these double sheets in this manner until all the mixture has been used. With the quantities given, four large sheets of wrapping paper can be covered. When you want to use any of it, cut off a piece and draw the sheets apart.

If you want a fly paper of another sort, one that is not poisonous, put one pound of quassia wood in a sancepan with two quants of water, and soak over night. In the morning boil until there is but one pint of liquid left. Soak sheets of blotting paper in this and then dry them. Set away for use. Put small pieces of the paper in a saucer with a little water, and place where the flies will taste the liquid.

WHAT THE DUTIES OF A HOUSEKEEPER ARE

SUBSCRIBER wishes to know what the A duties of a housekeeper are in a private family. This question is hard to answer, since every family has different requirements. A housekeeper for people of limited means usually does all the work. In a family where only one or two servants are kept she must do many things about the house basides serior ally does all the work. In a family where only one or two servants are kept she must do many things about the house, besides sewing and mending. The housekeeper in a fashionable household does not have manual labor to perform, but she must know how everything should be done. It is her business to be entirely familiar with the duties of each servant, and to see that they are properly performed. Every part of the house, from the attic to the cellar, is under her charge. She hires and pays the servants, does the marketing, gives out household supplies, unless the establishment be so large that a steward is employed; sees that the household farmiture, linen, utensils, etc., are kept in order, and that they are renewed when they are worn out or defared. She also makes out the bills of fare for each day, studying the taste of each individual in the family, and trying to cater to it. She takes charge of the flowers in the parlors and dining-room. In fact, she must know everything about the requirements and desires of a refined household, and be capable of filling a gap herself should one of the servants fall her.

The position of housekeeper is a most trying and delicate one. No matter how competent a woman may be, if she lack tact and refinement she will find it hard to get along smoothly. #### A WISE SELFISHNESS

AN a mother spend herself too freely for berchildren? Hundreds of thousands of good mothers all over the land will answer unhesitatingly: "No! there is nothing too nuch for a mother to do for her child." It is true; but, like all truths, it has its limitations. What does the wise mother desire for her child? Perfection of character. She wishes to guide and train it so that it may pass through this life a blessing to itself and to those with whom it comes in contact. Can she do this by always yielding to its desire for pleasure and personal comfort? By making its own ease the first thought, by removing every roughness from its path? AN a mother spend her-

WHEN the question is put to her she says: "No; of course not; no one would be so foolish as to expect it." And yet, when it comes to be a question between her gratification and her child's, does also not always put her own aside? The woman who sits in a darketed soon explicit of the strainer. ways put her own saide? The woman who sits in a durkened room, evening after evening, rocking her baby to sleep because the small tyrant will scream if she leaves it, is sowing seeds of selfishness. If, later, slee tries to educate it more wisely, she has to transple down, or pull up, the weeds which ought never to have been allowed to sprout.

She owes the evening to herself and her husband, who has a right to some share of her time.

IT always seems to me intensely sad to see faults in children which are the conse-In faults in children which are the consequence of over-indulgence by those in authority over them. When a child speaks impertinently to his mother, or rudely to his brothers and sisters, when he lifts his hand to strike his nother, or persistently disobeys her, one knows without the need of long explanations that the early training has been defective. Is there a sadder sight than to see a young girl taking the best of everything for herself, to the utter disregard of the mother who has spent her life for her? The girl has been brought up to place herself first and her mother second in everything; she is scarcely to blame if she does it almost instinctively. Unless she has a very noble nature she will do it without any compunction. it without any compunction.

If the family means are small, she must have the pretriest dress, the freshest rib-bons, the most expensive hat. Her mother says: "Ob, it is no matter about me!" and says; "Oh, it is no nestier about me!" and the daughter echoes the sentiment, which should never have been attreed. When both cannot go on a pleasure trip it is the mother who stays at home, saying to herself: "Young people ought to have a good time; the cares of life come soon emough to us all!" She does not remember that the selfish spirit she is for larging is a had accountion to need them. If tering is a bad preparation to meet them. If there is disagreeable work to be done the mother assumes it, because she cannot hear to see the pretty hands roughoned or the fair complexion reddened. Household work should be a delight to a healthy girl, and one of her aweetest pleasures should be to spare and save her mother.

LITTLE glycerine and rose water will A nake her hands smooth and soft, and there are harmless cosmetics which will restore her complexion. If she lets her mother overtask her strength while she stands idly by, she is laying up a store of remorse many tenes will not wash sway. She will not do this if, all her life, she has been accustomed to see her mother treated with deference, her tastes consulted, her advice sought, her wishes followed. She will feel that naturally a part of the burden should rest upon her strong, young shoulders, and shrink from the idea of allowing her mother to do anything she would consider it derogntory to do herself.

A. MOTHER does spend berself too freely for ther children when she gives up her own rights to them, effaces berself so that they do not recognize her superior claims, makes it difficult for them to "honor" her, as the Fifth Commandment densands that they shall do.

It is a wise selfishness that makes the 11 is a wise selfishness that makes the mother insist upon keeping ber proper place in the family as the crown and center of home, femierly loving her children, serving thom in all legitimate ways, but seeing that they take their fair share of the burdens of life, instead of weakly hearing them herself.

THE LITTLE LIFE

BY IDA WORDEN WHEELER

O LOST delight! How chill and gray
The breath and bloom of summer day. In robin's song there lurks a moan, The breeze takes on a sobbing tone, Since baby died.

O vanished joy! The hours thrice blessed When closely to my bosom pressed The flaxen head. And now the smart Of lightened arms, and weighted heart, Since baby died, O mother love! To dream, to wait, To hope, to bear, to bless my fate, Then death. Of what avail to rave? There still remains the little grave, Since baby died.

O pure, sweet life! Thy fragrance rare Still lingers in the silent air. Like voiceless prayer it lulls my pain, And frozen grief drops down in rain, Since baby died.

INEXPENSIVE THINGS FOR BABY

BY KATHERINE C. WELDON

AM opposed to a cradle for a baby, I disliked the motion of a ham-mock, it always made me ill; and thinking my child might feel the same, and not being able to say so be forced to bear it whether or uded to leak for a heal as inexten-

so be forced to bear it whether or no, I concluded to look for a bed as inexpensive as possible. I had seen fancy baskets, and liked them, but they were very costly. I could not afford one, but they gave me an idea. Why could I not twine a common woven willow clothes-basket? So I carried my idea into execution. It was considered such a success that I will try to describe it. I bought the largest sized basket with a wooden bottom and gave the whole, inside and out. bought the largest sized basket with a wooden bottom and gave the whole, inside and out, three coats of white paint, the last being the white enamel. The ends of the willow are left on the outside, and are cut bias. Those little ends I painted delicate blue (any color may be used); I then tied a large blue bow on ench handle. My baby came in November. During the winter months I kept my little basket had on a large white for the bow or busing the winter months I kept by little basket bed on a large white far rug by way of roaking it look warner. And with a dear baby snugly tucked in between downy pillows and little delicate blue comforter, the little head resting on a white pillow, it was not only a cheap, pretty bed, but a very comfortable one, which all admired, never once giving the cost a thought.

A very useful article was a both blanket. took two and a baif yards of cotion flannel (a quality such as can be bought for about tifteen quality such as can be bought for about lifteen cents a yard) and cut it in two pieces. In one of my Ladies' House Journals I found a picture of a baby just ready for a bath. This I transferred with impression paper to the fleecy side of one piece near the end, and otched it in delicate blue Germantown yarm. That done, I laid the two pieces facing each other, keeping the fleecy side out, basted the edges firmly, then buttonholed around the blanket loser and short stitch with the yarm to hold them together. I spread this blanket over my lap when holding my baby to bathe bim. It was soft, warm and very useful.

I made, to hold the dispers, a trunk. My grocery mms gave me a cracker box; to strengthen the lid I nailed slats, or thin strips of pine en the lid I mailed slats, or thin strips of pine across the under side. I attached the lid to the box with a small pair of hinges, then papered it inside and out with light wall paper. Such a box is also pretty covered with cretonus, using large brass-headed tacks to hold the cretonus in place.

My baby basket I made of a Mexican oratige basket; first lined it with delicate blue muslin, over which I fulled dotted bobbinet from the upper edge falling to the floor; I made a full ruffle of the muslin and net. These baskets are about one foot and a half deep, and come with an oval cover. This cover I turned upside down, making a till of my basket, in which I sewed my cushions, bags, etc. It was pretty when finished, besides being very useful, as I always kept the basket under the till filled with towels and soft wash rags.

who sought to comfort her. I did not quote the Bible, but I did long to quote the "doctor." One half of the deaths of infants are caused by irregular feeding." I refrained, however, as it was too late to do any good in that case; but I wish those words might be written in letters of fire on the walls of every nursery. Mothers who would never think of taking their own meals at any and all of taking their own meals at any and all hours of the day and night, knowing that dyspepsia would certainly result, will subject their babies to that treatment, and then try to allay their suffering by more feeding, "perhaps end-ing the drama," to quote from Mrs. Stanton on this subject. VALUE OF ICE IN TEETHING

I WISH all mothers knew of the wonderful value of ice during baby's teething period. Keep for the purpose resuments of fine, firm table markings and the serverity inside bits of ice, making a bag of ice, which will fit comfortably into leaby's mouth, and leaving smoogh of the dry linen hanging below for him to hold it by. A child will press hard, and this down eagerly upon this with game so for each and swellow that he would not allow anything obe to much them, so southing is the cook, hard substance to them, while the water nickling slewly from the ice into a hot morth becomes or warmed before reaching the stometh that no fear of harm need arise from that source. I have used this will two children most successfully. My little girl was teeling through the months of June, July and August, and never had a wakeful night nor a "but lead," mainly, if not wholly, due to the fact that I kept her feet warm and her month cost.

But how can this one thing needful be gained?

Not by medicine-simply and solely by using the proper food. The physician often prescribes lactated food instead of medicine; the nurse recommends it for her babies; while experienced mothers urge their friends to use this pure and simple food. There is nothing secret about lactated food. It is prepared from wheat and barley, combined with sugar of milk and the necessary boneforming elements. As a result, lactated food saves babies' lives, and gives them health and harpiness. Druggists everywhere self lactated food, or it will be sent by mail on receipt of price. It is the most economical food known, a 25 cent can making ten pints of prepared food.

FLOWERS AT FUNERALS

BY H. H. BATTLES

HEN death has visited the home of a friend there is no more delicate way of expressing one's sympathy than by sending a few flowers. Several years ago the florists invented many mon-strosities in the way of "funeral designs," which caused among the cultivated a distaste for such "emblems." The better class of florists do not now offer these designs, class of florists do not now offer these designs, and consequently the beautiful custom of sending flowers to funerals is increasing. One other point the thoughtful florist of to-day is careful to avoid—that the chosen flowers be not too fragrant. At one time tuberoses were extensively tised, and the odor from them was conversely a that with them linears in ways. so oppressive that with them lingers in many minds the association of death. Lettering on designs of flowers is generally in bad taste. If it is desirable to say anything let it be neatly written on the card which accompanies the

THE CHOICE OF COLOR

CILUSTERS of flowers are always pretty if CLUSTERS of flowers are always pretty if the flowers are well chosen and arranged grocefully. It is advisable to arrange the clusters flat on one side that they may be laid down with no fear of braising the flowers. In selecting flowers for an infant it is well to choose very delicate white ones. For young people a little pink is in good taste, and for elderly people purple violets and pansies are used with the white. An effective arrangement can be made by tying two of the clusters together by the stems, allowing the ribbon to fall gracefully among the flowers.

Should one not wish to send anything, but fall gracefully among the flowers.

Should one not wish to send anything, but desirous to pay some little tribute to their friend, a pretty idea is to carry a handful of flowers and place them on the casket, or on the grave. A wreath of laurel, of the common box (buxus sempervirens), or of any "evergreen" folinge is pretty, and should this green have been gathered from some spot that the decreased was fond of there will be many loving associations attached to it. A wreath of white flowers, chrysantheanums, carnations, or balsam compactly arranged with a cluster of pink. sam compactly arranged with a cluster of pink flowers on one side, or a wrenth of ivy leaves with a few flowers arranged as if apparently lasted on with a band of purple violets or pan-sies, or a small wreath of the blue forget-me-not, or this dainty little flower on a white wreath, are appropriate. A crescent wreath is also very graceful, one side very much smaller than the other and tied with ribbon with flowers drawn through the knot.

CROSSES, BASKETS AND ANCHORS

CIROSSES can be made in a great variety of ways. The same combination of flowers as that suggested for wreaths is pretty. When making an ivy cross, ivy beaves should be wired separately and laid flat. A few sprays of ivy gracefully twined around the cross, relieving the stiffness, or a few flowers at the insection of the arms lashed on with a hand of flowers is year effection. A beautiful cross. flowers, is very effective. A beautiful cross may be made by arranging pure white flowers very compactly, though the effect will be as if it were chiseled out of marble. Over the arms throw a garland of delicately-colored flowers, or some delicate vine apparently climbing over the cross.

Flat baskets loosely arranged with flowers and maiden-hair fern generously scattered through are always effective. A flat panel of ivy leaves forms a beoatiful background for a cluster of flowers; if tilies can be had, it is pretty to use a large cluster of them with their long stems. Palm leaves are emblematic of victory. Two of these tied with ribbon are often used. When more than two, it is well to give a decided curve to one of them. Sometimes a few flowers are used in addition, and instead of tying with ribbon, several leaves of the striped pandanus reitchii are used for the knot. An anchor, emblematic of hope, is pretty. When these forms are used the outline of the design should be strictly adhered to. Boxes of loose flowers are always acceptable, and can be arranged with good effect at the grave. Flat baskets loosely arranged with flowers

In place of the crape on the door a pretty custom is to the a cluster, or wreath of flowers, with touches of color as suggested in the

FLOWERS AT THE GRAVE

UNTIL cremation becomes the accepted the the tree will be graves. If the women of the family go to the grave much of the danger to their health can be lessened by placing carpet, marting, or boards on the ground where they walk or stand. If it storms there should be an awning placed that may protect them. Death has often been traced to exposure at the grave. The family are frequently in a low physical condition caused by long and anxious watch-ing, and are particularly susceptible to cold. Much of the horror of death may be avoided by lining the grave with greens of various kinds, also covering the mound of soil with green. The flowers that were sent to the house can be taken to the grave by a special carriage and may be arranged before the family arrives. It is here where well-chosen flowers and designs are appreciated, and see to it that there are none that will leave an unhappy there are more that will leave an unbappy impression, such as a clock pointing to the "fatal hour," or a broken ladder, which sug-gests climbing, struggling, but at last falling, or a "setting san" with the rays two or three inches mide, or words made of poorly-shaped letters and saying nothing that touches a pleasant chord in the minds of the becaved. Let there be none of these, but in their place let there be an abundance of greens and flowers

And the impression left on one's mind will be far, far different than though nothing but the cold, maked earth were seen.

It is but natural for people to inquire of you about a friend who is seriously ill, and you will often gain triends by a courteous answer. But let it be a case in which people suspect something of a delicate nature and you will be delaged by questions from people whose sole interest in the patient is that of curiosity. To such people, and of such patients, say very, very little. #### WHAT I SOMETIMES THINK

By T. DE WITT TALMAGE, D. D.

THAT the women who are continually complaining that they are insulted need to understand that there is something in their carriage to invite insult.

That we are never more subject to attack from our spiritual enemies than when in the garden of ease. There is less danger for us when out in the conflict of life than when we sit down to rest.

That as long as we have reasonable wants we get on comfortably, but it is the straggle after luxuries that fills society with distress, and populates prisons, and sends hundreds of people stark mad. Dissatisfied with a plain house, and ordinary apparel, and respectable surroundings, they plunge their heads into enterprises and speculations from which they have to sneak out in disgrace.

That it is our misfortune that we mistake God's shadow for the right. If a man stands between you and the sun his shadow falls up-on you. So God sometimes comes and stands between us and worldly successes, and His shadow falls upon us, and we wrongly think that it is night.

That a great deal of the piety of to-day is too exclusive; it hides itself. It needs more fresh air, more out-door exercise.

That all the waters that ever leaped in torrent, or foamed in cascade, or fell in summer shower, or hung in morning dew, give no such coolness to the fevered soul as the smallest drop that ever flashed out from the showering fountains of the divine Book.

That some Christians serve God so tremendously on Sunday that they are cross and crabbed all the week. Doing too many things on Sunday, they do nothing well all the rest

That when a Christian marries an atheist it always makes conjoined wretchedness; for if a mun does not believe there is a God he is neither to be trusted with a dollar nor with your lifelong happiness.

F plants were put out in the open ground during the summer, it will be necessary to begin to make prepara-tions for taking them up and getting them ready for a return to the house by the coming of cold weather. Do not neglect to do this at the proper time if you want them to do well during the coming winter. Many persons keep putting off the work until frosty nights are upon them. Then, when they know that it is absolutely necessary that something should be done at once, they take up their plants, using whatever soil is handi-est, and doing all the work in such a hurried manner that it is generally but half done, and as a consequence their plants so into the as a consequence their plants go into the house in such a condition that they cannot be expected to do more than live, and many of them do well if they do that.

GETTING READY FOR AUTUMN

BEGIN to get ready for cold weather while it is warm and pleasant, and do your work leisurely. Under such conditions it will be your own fault if it is not done well. Prepare good soil. Prepare more of it than you need just at this time, because you will require more or less all through the season as many plants will need re-potting before spring opens. Pick up old broken pots and crockery and break them up into bits for drainage. Wash old pots well before using them.

oreax them up into bits for drainage. Wash old pots well before using them.

Before taking up plants from the beds, cut about them with a spade. Do this in such a manner as to leave a ball of earth, with roots intact, about as large as the pot in which you think it advisable to put the plant. This will cut off the old roots which have extended so far on all sides that they have outgrown the limits of an ordinary pot, and induce new roots to start inside the ball of earth. In this way you have a new growth begun before the plant is lifted, and it will be easy to pot it without much disturbance of the soil, consequently it will rupidly become established in its new quarters, and by the time it is necessary to take it into the house it will be growing. If you do not do this before re-potting, there will be so great a disturbance of the roots that the plant will be seriously affected, and it is because of this that I always advise those having plants that are to be carried through another winter in the house it have having plants that are to be carried through another winter in the house to keep them growing in pots all through the season.

THE SEASON'S BEST NEW PLANTS

T this time it is well to look over the new A plants sent out by the dealers, and see what kinds have proved worthy of special

Among the begonias I think the President Carnot the best. It is a free grower and a profuse bloomer, and quite as easily cared for as the good old rubra, which it somewhat resembles. Its chief superiority to the old favorite is its free branching quality. In this respect it is quite equal to any of the standard sorts, and its great freedom of bloom and the beauty of its great panicles of brilliant flowers recommend it to the attention of all who admire this beautiful family of plants.

Among the new fuchsias the Countess of Aberdeen is most noticeable, because of its color. It is, so far as I know, the only entirely white variety. Many will not admire it as Among the begonias I think the President white variety. Many will not admire it as much as they do the more brilliantly-colored varieties, but they must admit its great beauty. To my mind it is much more beautiful than any of the scarlet and purple sorts.

One of the most satisfactory flowers of the same of the most satisfactory flowers of the same of the most satisfactory flowers of the same of season has been the new nasturtium, Bismarck. It is especially adapted to pot culture, because it is not of such rampant growth as most of the old sorts. Its flowers are of a most intense scarlet, overlaid with orange, and the petals have a velvety texture that is charming. The follage is much darker than that of the ordinary kinds, and not so large and aggressive. With me it has bloomed throughout the entire season, and to-day is as full of buds as ever. I am confident that it will prove to be a most

Among out-door plants nothing has given more pleasure than the Marguerite and queen carnations. While not equal in all respects to the carnation of the greenhouse, they come so near it that we ought to be satisfied. They are all that has been claimed for them, and that is saying a great deal for a new plant in these days of most extravagant claims by en-these days of most extravagant claims by en-terprising dealers.

The Shirley poppy has given excellent satis-faction. It is one of the best plants we have for garden use. It blooms freely, and makes a most gorgeous show of color. Nothing finer in the way of scarlet can be imagined. Great beds of it on the lawn made a solid mass of color for weeks, and many persons stopped to ask what that remarkably brilliant flower mas. White extremely abovy there is nothing course about them

TUBEROUS BEGONIAS

TUBEROUS BEGONIAS

A NOTHER season's trial of these begonias convinces me that my first estimate of them was correct. They are certainly among the most desirable of all plants for the summer decoration of the window and greenhouse. Such wonderful variety of color, red. scarlet, crimson, maroon, pink, salmon, yellow and pure white, and both double and single flowers of great size and produced in wonderful profusion. They are more brilliant than the gloxinia, and much freer in bloom, and much easier to grow well. Indeed, I find them quite as easy to grow as a geranium. Plant there in a soil of loam, turfy matter and sand, in April, using small pots at first. After they have made a growth of an inch or two, shift to pots one size larger, and about a month or six weeks later put them into five and six inch pots, and after that let them alone, giving some sort of fertilizer along toward the latter part of summer if you have reason to think that the fertility of the soil is exhausted. In fall, when the leaves begin to turn yellow, withhold the supply of water, and when the soil is quite dry set the pots away in some corner and give them no attention till spring. Be sure, however, that you put them in some place that is free from frost. In April proceed as directed above. While blooming keep in a shaded place and water moderately. Some advise planting them freely for bedding purposes, but I have serious doubts about their value for such use. I do not think they are able to stand our strong sun satisfactorily. I have only grown them in pods, therefore I am not able to speak about them as bedding plants from any experience of my own, but such as I have seen growing in the ground in totalities folly avaround to the most in the process. plants from any experience of my own, but such as I have seen growing in the ground in tocalities fully exposed to the sun were not up to what I require of a bedding plant.

POTTING PLANTS WITH SUCCESS

LiFT your plants toward evening, or on a cloudy day, if possible. Water well as soon as potted, and place them where they can be well shaded, but be sure to leave them in an airy place. If this is done early in the fall, there will often be spells of very pleasant weather in which they can be left out, but do not expose them to the sun until active growth has begun after potting. At the time of potnot expose them to the sun until active growth has begun after potting. At the time of potting cut off as much of the top as you think will balance the loss of roots which the plant has met with. Most persons dislike to do this because it spoils the present appearance of the plant, but it is very necessary that it should be done if you want the plants to do well later on, as the roots left are not in a condition to do extra work, as they must if all the old top is to be nourished and provided for.

Many plants, in fact, most of them, which were left in pots through the summer, will require re-potting, or, at least a partial substitution of fresh soil for old. Attend to this now, in short, do all the work that seems necessary, so that when the time comes to remove your so that when the time comes to remove your plants to the house all there is to do is to take them in. If a plant was re-potted last spring, it may not be necessary to entirely re-pot it. In this case remove as much of the soil as you an without greatly disturbing the roots, and fill in with freshly prepared compost. With plants depended on for flowering through the winter this is preferable to re-potting, as the plant is not stimulated to such an extent by excess of nutriment as to set about making a excess of nutriment as to set about making a great growth of branch, which always inter-feres with free flowering, but with plants grown for their foliage entire re-potting is advisable, as what you want from them is a vigorous growth of top, in order to secure as many leaves as possible. Bear in mind, then, the difference in the nature of your plants while getting ready for winter.

If you have plants that have made rampant growth during the summer, shorten them in well before taking to the house. This ap-well before taking to the house. This ap-plies especially to gerantums, abutilous, heliotropes and some varieties of begonia.

PLANTS FOR WINTER BLOOMING

AM constantly receiving letters from pur-I ties who want a "few good winter-blooming plants," and the majority of them read something like this: "I want something that something like this: "I want something that will be sure to bloom well. I can't have many, and I can't give such care as many kinds require. Tell me what to get in order to make sure of flowers under ordinary living-room conditions." To all such inquiries I would say that the list of desirable plants that I can advise is not a long one. Perhaps it is well that it is so, as it simplifies the matter of a selection. I can safely advise geraniums, such varieties of begonia as rubra and weltoniensis, abutilons in variety, heliotropes, lantanas, streptosolen, calla and speciosa fuchsia. These, with proper care, will be pretty sure to flower well during most of the senson. They are not "new" plants, nor are they "choice" ones from a dealer's standpoint, but they are good ones, and that, I take it, is what my correspondents want,

HERPS AND HINTS

M. F. K.—It is advisable to graft lemon seedling plants, because they come into bearing sooner.

Lou-Worms in pots are injurious to plants; they some from using barrayard manure. Apply time water ad they can be driven out.

Mass G.—The solanum jasminoides plant is a climber, bearing white dowers to small clusters. The flowers are star-shaped and very pretty. It is of very easy esti-tivation, and you will find it a good plant for training about a bay window.

Mass R.—The cohes scandens is a rapid grower and quite a free bloomer. It can be grown in ordinary soil and does very well in the living room. Its flowers are a wort of number with a greenish tinge, shaped like those of the campanils. It is a good vine to train about the frame of a bay window.

MARY GRANT—I do not think you would be likely to find the sweet pea satisfactory in the ordinary living room, because it is fined of a most and somewhat ord atmosphere, two conditions which we seldem find in the dwelling. If the air is very dry red spider will be sure to attack it, and the plant soon dies.

MARGUREPTE G.—It is hardly worth while to at tempt to winter a pancy that has bloomed probably it present season. Sow recel in August or September, and raise good, strong plants for next season's flowering Victorians will hardly be fikely in survive out of doors. Marguerite carnetions are not learly at the nexts.

SEVERAL INQUIRERS—You can winter obunders safely in the cellar. Do not water after putting them away, unders the soil seems to be getting very dry. Keep them as tred as possible without fresting, and you will find that they remade to a sort of domain con-dition from which they will emerge in spring without having sustained the least injury.

M. N. N.—In my opinion the very best rose for house-culture is Agrippina. This variety has dark crimson flowers which are freely produced on good plants. The flowers are not very large nor very double, but they are beautiful for all that. It seems better adapted to the conditions which prevail to ordinary rooms than any other variety. Queens' scarlet comes next. This is a larger flower than Agrippina, but very similar in form and color.

Ponny—The clea fragrams belongs to the tea family. Its leaves are thick and firm in texture, and its flowers os small as to be almost uncotherable without the closest impaction. But they are so extremely sweet that a tiny cluster of them will make quite a coon fragrant. They have the rich, heavy odor peculiar to the luberose and cape journation. Give it a conservint beavy soil of learn and do not overwater. Keep its follows clean by frequent weaking in whate-off swap. Scale often troubles it unless this is done.

Max. D.—The linom tryglnum is probably the plant you ask about. It is a winter bloomer, bearing great quantities of rich yellow flowers staped very much like those of the morning gory, though withs smaller throat and a more expanded corolla. A plant of it in fail bloom in winter is very beautiful. It is very easily grown. A variety of linem—flavum—was sold some two or three years ago, but it falled to give satisfaction because it did not bloom freely. In purchasing be sure to insist on getting linum tryginum.

Max. J. B., D.—This correspondent writes that she is training a geranium as directed in the article on an "Ideal Geranium," land that so many branches are starting near the base of the plant that she thinks some ought to be removed. She will have to judge about this for herself. I would say, bowever, that it is not often that we find a geranium with too many branches. Unless there are so many that they crowd each other and prevent first development I would not remove any. One of the things to aim at is a bushy, compact plant.

One of the things to aim at is a bushy, compact plant.

Mas. Woop—Yes, there is a "striped grass" which is considerably used in hanging baskets, and it is very presty. I have a flue specimen of it in my window as I write. It is catalogued as penicion variegation. Its follage is green, striped with pure white, and after a fittle it takes on a sed onler, which gives a plant a most striping appearance. The branches are showler and drops to a length of three or four feet. In order to secure a thick growth it will be found necessary to place back the plant from time to time at first, until you have a good many branches starting from the base of the plant, as it does not branch very freely after branches are allowed to make mach growth.

Mass M. C. K.—Ross can be transplanted as fely, in be made stacks growth.

Mass M. C. K.—Roses can be transplanted safely in the fall, but it should be done as soon as the leaves fall, not just at the cicelar-in of cold weather. Spring planting, however, is preferable. Bo not report the aminy-like often. Frequent disturbance of the roots prevents its bioming. Romove some of the soil from the top of the pot and put fresh compost in its place. This is better than reporting unless the pot is craw-ded with roots, my which case re-pot shortly after blooming. Callasseddom bloom before they are a year old. The difference between byteld perpetual rises and what the florists call ever-bloomies is, the latter bloom all through the season, while the hybrid perpetuals bloom at intervals, but never very freely after the first crap of the season.

D. B. F.—You cought to be able to obtain two breekers.

but never very freely after the first crop of the season.

D. B. F. — You sught to be able to obtain tree brackets at any hardware store. If they are not kept in stock, your dealer will order for you, distributes. You will find them not only extremely meful in economizing space, but they are pretty, and many plants can be displayed more satisfactorily on them than in any other way. A drouging abstition, or a flerbal and mater of the slender-growing begonias present a very graceful effect when allowed to train themselves from a bracket. Get five-put brackets. They are much preferable to the two-pot ones. Five-pot ones generally have these arms which can be awaing apart widely, or moved together, as desired. They are very strong, and five pots of ordinary size can be used on one at the sense time without any danger of its brenking. With one of these brackets on arrange plants of drouging table in such a function of a window, and another at the top, you can arrange plants of drouging table in such a manner as to completely frame your window in greenery. The two smaller stands for puts at the back of the five-pot brackets can be used for unpright growing plants.

est can be used for upright growing plants.

RHODE ISLAND—It is hardly possible to say when filles should be planted for Easter flowering when they are to be grown in cooms or greenhouses where the conditions are such that their growth cannot be regulated to a nicety, as it can where all facilities are available. Stiling-rooms and greenhouses in which solved collections or plants are kept, are generally so warm that a plant poeted in October would be likely to come into those in January. I would advise you to write to some leading grower of this plant for Easter use, and ask him when to pot and how to control it. I do not attempt to keep my plants that for Easter, as I consider them as desirable at one time as another. My halfs are planted in October, and I generally have them in bloom shortly after the new year. By keeping some of them in a cool room the flowering season is delayed considerable. I pet large builts in a seven or eight-inch pot half fail of a rich compost, and set them away in the dark. When roots have formed, and I makes that green knives are pushing. I bring up some of them. As the stalk grows up I fill in about it with soil, as roots are sent out from it above the built.

F. S. Alasy—The primoin obscules clant is considerable.

op 1 fill in about it with soil, as roots are sent out from it above the built.

F. S. Alaxx.—The primois obcosion plant is one of the very best winter bisomers we have. It stands continging better than almost any other, and is not particular about the amount of westines it gets, and on this section it is useful for growing in places where it will be shaded by larger plants. It insists, however, on having a good deal of water. It has themsands of fine roots which take up water very rapidly, and if only such quantities as are furnished and found sofficient for the wants of a geranium are given, it will to give satisfaction. Because its requirements in this respect are not understood, persons often fail to grow it well. If those who have places would examine the roots of them and study the effects of water on them, they would soon discover that fine, threus-worted kinds requirements and those large ones. The believings has a great mass of small roots, and so this account it requires a fiberal supply of water daily, but as it does not always get it, plants other fail to grow and those well. Plants with many fiber roots generally form them in a mass in the context of the pot, and they become so compart there that water, when given in small quantities, falls to prove the analysis. It is a good plan to have the soil in the context of the plant becomes unbeatility. It is a good plan to have the soil in the caser of the plant than away from the base of the plant.

THE AUTUMNAL FLORAL SHOW

By ERES E. REXFORD

September the garden ought to be gny with color. It will, if you have made a good selection of plants, and given them proper treatment.

The dahlin is one of our best full bloomers if given plenty of water and rich food. The single sorts and the cactus dahlin are more popular than the older double sorts. They are quite as showy, quite as rich in color and really match more craceful. much more graceful.

FLOWERS FOR AUTUMNAL BLOOMING

A MONG bedding plants few produce a more striking display than salvin splendens, with its plumes of fiery scarlet. It is a grand decorative plant. To produce the best results with it, plant it where it will have a background of evergreens to show its flowers against. If you want a strong color contrast. against. If you want a strong color contrast, use helianthus multiflorus plena with it. The scarlet of one and the rich yellow of the other will heighten and intensify each other, and make the garden glow with tropical magnificance of color.

The cosmos is a charming fall flower, the only trouble with it is that it is so very late in coming into bloom. 'Unless started very early in the season, it will not begin to bloom nuch before the coming of frost, and it is so tender that the least touch of frosty weather ruins it. It is charming in full flower; its airy blossoms dance and nod in every wind and show like stars against the pretty, feathery foliage.

Asters are among the best of all flowers for fall display; they stand the frosts well, and are almost always in full bloom when really cold fall weather sets in. I like the plan of planting them among the border where there will be no other flower in bloom at this time, unless it is the Japan snemone, and that they contrast well with in habit and color.

Pansics will be growing larger and finer as the weather becomes cooler. I almost alwayshaye finer ones in the cool October days than at any other time of the year.

Many of the hybrid associated poses will have oner ones in the cool October days than at any other time of the year.

Many of the hybrid perpetual roses will give a fair show of bloom in fall if properly attended to. In order to scare flowers from them, one must be careful to cut the branches back well from time to time, also to keep the soil very rich. These attentions induce new growth, and only from new growth will flowers be obtained.

Do not neelect the garden new that the flowers be obtained.

Do not neglect the garden now that the greatest show of flowers is past. Keep it clean and neat. Much of the charm of a garden depends on its keeping. A house with rich furniture in it will not be attractive unless well kept. A tastefully cared-for house with very ordinary furniture will give more delight. It is the same with a garden. No matter how many fine flowers you may have in it, it will not please the fasticious unless it is well taken care of. Neatness is all-important, and especially so at a time when a lock of it will be so apparent, because of the fallof it will be so apparent, because of the fall-ing off in quantity of flowers and consequently in brilliance of showy effects, which during the earlier part of the senson may cause lack of proper attention to be less noticeable.

TWO POPULAR GERANIUMS

A LITTLE gem among variegated leaved plants is the Madame Sallerio geranium. It forms a perfect mass of foliage, of pale green edged with pure white. It never requires any training. Let it alone and it will send up from a dozen to twenty stalks to a height of four or five inches, seldom more, and these give a compact little bush whose leaves are so thick that you see nothing behind them. Each plant is literally a cushion of foliage. For use among other plants I know of nothing more effective. I grow dozens of plants of it for greenhouse decoration. Its leaves are very useful for small bouquets. It never blooms, I think. I have never seen a flower on my plants, at any rate. bouquets. It never blooms, I think. I have never seen a flower on my plants, at any rate. Something over a year ago I spoke of the great beauty of the Souvenir de Mirande geranium. Since then I have had an opportunity of seeing what it can do in the greenhouse and sitting-room, and I can unbesitatingly say that it is one of the best winter bloomers I have ever grown. It blooms constantly. It is a very robust and bealthy grower. And it is one of the most beautiful representatives of this popular family. The peculiar blending of rose, sainon and white in its petals gives it a much more delicate effect than any other geranium. There is not a suggestion of coarseness about it. It is very floriferous, and two or three plants made the greenhouse bright at times when there were but few other flowers out.

AN ANNUAL THAT FLOWERS IN WINTER

SOME of the annuals will flower very well in the house in winter. The refunds is a in the house in winter. The petunia is a specimen of this class. If you take up a thrifty seedling in September and pot it, it will come into full bloom in November, and if you are careful to cut off the flowers as soon as they begin to fade you will have flowers all the time. This plant may be common, and on this account many would object to it, but its flowers are so bright and cheerful, and produced so freely and constantly, that it will win your friendship in spite of all prejudices, and you will find that one such plant is worth a score of "choicer" kinds which have to be coaxed and coddled, and then fail to give much return in the way of flowers. One lady told me this summer that the most satisfactory told me this summer that the most satisfactory plant she had in her conservatory in the winter was a petunia that came up in a pot of soil brought in from the garden. "It just took care of itself," she said. "It was never without flowers, and it had such a brave, sturdy way about it that I couldn't help making a friend of it. I had plants that I admired more, in a certain way, because they had a more brilliant color, or were more striking and noticeable in various ways, but not one that I liked as well as I did my little restants." liked as well as I did my little petunia.

THE ART OF HANGING PICTURES

BY VIRGINIA N. BASH.

HERE is nothing adds so much to the furnishing of a house as the pictures on the wall, and even Mr. Easthake, relentless iconoclast as he is, says that "they contribute greatly to that appearance of comfort which is the especial characteristic of an English home." Take down the familiar pictures and the strategies are and meaning for the strategies.

the apartment seems have and meagre. Re-hang them in the new house and at once an air, attractve and home-like, settles upon the unnecustomed surroundings.

In Enrope it is quite customary to hang family portraits in the dining-room, or, should the space prove insufficient, in the adjoining hall. And this seems reasonable when the portraits have intrinsic excellence, but the practice that has grown up in the United States of retaining large photographs of deceased friends upon the wall after they have become failed carriers uses of the dranated is become faded caricatures of the departed, is not to be commended on the score of sentiment

Different kinds of pictures should never be hung together, and though few modern houses are sufficiently spacious to admit of setting aside a room for each kind, they may at least he assigned to separate walls. It is also important that such pictures as require a glass should not be hung opposite a window, where the reflections on the glass will entirely destroy the effect. Neither should a very gay French painting be hung near a cool, quiet landscape, or, by contrast, the one will be valgarized and the other made to seem tame and uninteresting.

A LMOST every person knows that the approved height for hanging pictures is five feet six inches from the floor to the center of the canvas, but this rule does not apply to very large, or full-length studies, which must be somewhat higher. Nor is it necessary to place them close together. Small objects, such as scouces, mirrors, brackets, etc., may alternate the pictures with good effect.

UNLESS in a gallery, where some pictures must necessarily be above the eye line, It is better to have the picture hang flat against the wall. A tilting, unsteady picture is never seen to advantage, and is trying to the nerves of an observer. This difficulty will be entirely obviated if two cords are used instead of one, each suspended from a nail of its own. Flat chains which are made for the purpose give an appearance of solidity, and in case of large pictures, look well; an embroidered, fancy galloon is sometimes used in the same way with good effect, but care must be taken that it harmonizes with the wall behind it. Wire for this purpose first came into use because it was practically invisible, but this seems rather an objection than otherwise. If pictures must be hung at all, it is more comfortable to see how they are hung rather than to be haunted by a sense of insecurity.

In preparing a wall it is always well to remember that pictures appear to the best advantage against a vague, general design; one that does not assert itself. If choice of wall-covering is beyond our control, the defect may be remedied by suitable drapery, or even in case of large and important pictures, by a screen or curtain large enough to project beyond the frame and furnish a suitable background.

WITH these hints by way of guidance, you will be careful not to hang the new ploture too high or too low; not to surround it with neighbors of a different species from itself; not to place it, if glazed, opposite a window; and to see that it is placed firmly against the wall without the unsightly cord triangle that has come down to us from our fathers. A beautiful picture properly framed and appropriately hung becomes doubly valuable, while many another which appears cold and crude is made so by a neglect of these important points. portant points.

SUGGESTIONS FOR STENOGRAPHERS

BY NELLIE M. HANBY

office is situated in a sunny nook in the reading room of one of the most promi-nent hotels in Michigan, right down among the "lords of creation." I have occupied the same office for two years, and have found the gentlemen who frequent the hotel uni-formly courteous, but a stenographer's life has its difficulties, and I feel that my ex-perience may be of use to others who may be about to go and do likewise.

In the first place do not expect more than In the first place do not expect more than you are willing to give, and you will never be disappointed. You will no doubt be nervous at the outset—this seems to be the fate of all stenographers—but the next thing is to rid yourself of that bugbear. The only way I have ever found to do that is to forget self entirely and think only of the dictator, or the work in hand. It is, I think, the hardest lesson a stenographer has to learn.

Then, too, never by any means sacrifice accuracy for mere speed. Speed will come in good time. When a man conset to you to request you to tak; his dictation, do not harry, and thus do yourself and your dictator an inquest you to tak: his dicintion, do not hurry, and thus do yourself and your dictator an injury, but quickly (there is a great difference in "quickly" and "hurriedly") get together your note book and pen or pencil, as the case may be, and then signify your readiness to begin. If you tind your customer is talking too fast, kindly but firmly request him to talk a little slower; time you will be able to transcribe a clean, accurate copy. Most gentlemen will thank you for thus intimating your desire to do good and accurate work.

Another thing you will find of great benefit.

Another thing you will find of great benefit, try to do a little more than you promise. Make all your own corrections. A man, as a rule, does not care how be makes a correction, rule, does not care how be makes a correction, and I have known some men to take a malicious pleasure in mutilating good copy. Do not allow him the chance to correct.

Never copy from manuscript verbatim (I will make an exception in I. w work, of course), unless your manuscript is entirely flawless. Make your copy as much better as you can, both as regards the language and punctuation. Get your copy up in the very best style you possess. In such a case you will never full to win a pleasant "Thank you;" from your customer, and what is more, his future work.

In a little while, by strict attention to some of these small details, you will find yourself guining rapidly in confidence, and also increasing your store of knowledge. Use your eyes and ears; hear and see all you can without seeming to do so. Guard against betraying confidence in even the smallest nantiers.

Study your customers; in fact, make your business a study of human nature. Beable to tell a crank the moment you put eyes upon him, and then work harder than you ever did him, and then work harder than you ever did in your life to please that crank. I remember making a very cranky man say "Thank you, madam!" He was a gruff, surly, two hundred pound man, and I suppose thought that no one on earth knew as made as he did, But before he knew it he had actually said "Thank you" and "Good-day, madam." I think that made me feel well for a week. Keen a dictionary near you, as you will made me feel well for a week.

Keep a dictionary near you, as you will certainly need it more than once, or I am very much mistaken. When you feel your need of it, take it up openly and find your words (even a strong apher is not expected to know everything)!

of it, take it up openly and had your works (even a strong, apher is not expected to know everything)!

Perhaps the most important thing I have left until the last, the absolute necessity of keeping your typewriter clean, as you cannot expect to get the best results from your labor from an unclean machine. Learn the mechanism of your instrument so that you can adjust it yourself, or tak it apart and put it together again. I mean this literally. I often hear stenographers say, "I can't do good work when I have such a miserable machine." Just look at your machine again and see if you have always kept it absolutely clean and froe from dust; see if you have allowed it to become guinneed with oil, etc.

Learn, also, to "time" your work, so that if it should accumulate you will be able to tell each customer exactly when he can have his work, and then see that you keep your promise. Finish your work exactly on time if possible. You will find that customers will learn to depend upon you, and it will materially add to your profits.

WALTER—Mr. Binine has now only one living son, his amesake, James G. Binine, Jr.

R. A.—It is customary for young people to wear mourning for their grandparents.

NURWALK-Saxe, the poet, is not living; he died at Albeny, N. Y., on March 31st, 1887.

MATTIK—"The Buchess" is the non-de plume of Mrs. Hungerford. She resides in Ireland.

CARRONDALE—We cannot uselst you in obtaining answers to any list of prize questions. Nonwalk..."George Fleming" is the nom de piume of Julia Fletcher, the notion of "Kismet."

ARTHUR-United States postage stamps are printed by the American Bank Note Company.

Sakan -The gentleman should always be introduced to the indy, and the younger lady to the older lady.

C. C. W.—John Jacob Astor and Miss Ava Willing were married in Philadelphia on February 17th, 1880.

CURIOUS-As soon as a letter is mailed it belongs to the person to whom it is addressed, not to the scader. ANNOVER-We should advise you to consult your family physician about the cruption of which you com-plain.

K. B.—We know of nothing which will remove spots from kid gloves that have been stalled from per-spiration.

Przztku-The phrase "modus vivendi" is Latin, and means "mode of living," or "mode of getting along together."

HOUSEKEEPER-Pruit mapkins are only used when rolt is served that would be likely to stain the white

P. R. A.—It was in John Wesley's sermon on "Dress" that the quotation "Cleanliness is indeed next to godit-ness" occurred.

Proon a -in England, Scotland and Wales single or widowed women vote for all elective officers, but one, on like terms with ness.

LAURA- Miss Emily Faithfull is an English woman who has devoted her life to the English working-woman. She has visited the United States.

Porrassan—The only restriction made in the naming f country past-offices is that there shall not be torn of the same name in the same State.

A. P. W.—Webster says that it is a "gross vidgarism" to use the word "guess" for think or believe, as "I guess he has come." "I guess it will rain." I SQU'IREE-Whitelaw Reid married, in 1881, Elbabeth, the only daughter of B. O. Mills, the California million-aire. He has two children, a boy and a girl.

Some wise s. A morganatic marriage is one in which the wife is of inferior rank to the husband, and in which the children do not inherit the father's like and posses-aious.

Biscont.inc.-It is said that common sulphur, freely sprinkled about, will basish the little silvery fed-simped inserts that so often lukest the pantries in country houses.

ANXIOUS-"Accound interest" in building society assets is the interest which is saved between the last usering of the fiscal year and the first meeting of the new year.

Taconv-It is considered very had form for a man to take a lady's arm on the street in the creating, or at any other time. It should be his privilege to offer his arm to the lady.

Jissa E.-Creules are persons born in Spanish Americs, or the West Indies, of European ancestors. You are mis-taken in your assertion that "creoks have a percentage of African birth."

School, now - We believe that Mr. Whittier has said binnelf that the story of "Barbara Frietchie" has no-feardation in fact, though at the time of the writing he believed otherwise.

D. J. L.—We suppose that the name "potter's field," acaptiled to a burial ground for the unknown pour, came from the field of that name educate Jerusalem. See the gaspet of 84. Matthew, AAVA, 1-39.

THAVELER—"Lot's Wife" is a round pillar about forty feel high, on a lofty beight, standing as if described from the general maye of the mountain, of the south western abore of the Dead Sea, in Paiesline.

CLARICE - Envelopes were first manufactured in 1845 for the use of the French Government. They were not adopted in England until after the passage of the cheap postage law in 1886. They came into the in this country a few years inter.

H. F. N.—The family name of the Prince Consort was Wettin, consequently, if in private life, Queen Victoria would be known as Mrs. Wettin. (2) "Hozekish disc-terworth" is not a note de planes, but the real name of the editor of the "Zig Zag Papers."

RATHLEES-The origin of the sentence "Zouth City of the Unsalted Seas," as applied to Dobath, has been subject for discussion, but we believe it is generally st-tributed to Bayan! Taylor, and that it occurred is one of his letters to the "New York Tribune."

Managerean At almost all formal binchroos, walk-ing or culling costumes are worn and bousest are not periored, but we cannot approve of this custom, and most addes you to allow your guest to remove their hats and make of your luncheou an informat, plement affair.

Seves Gines-Generally speaking requiring pas-seagers upon ocean electors are allowed to bring in free of data whatever is necessary for their health and conduct on the trip and whatever new apparet is soli-able for the seven of the year and for the station of the traveler.

Beray.—Yea should must requirily tall upon the bride, even if invited only to the weabling ceremony. It would be empossible for any bride to invite all her own and the groom's friends to the remedion held after the weatling, and you must not feel offended at bring left out of the house party.

LOUIE.—When calling upon a single faire it will be quite proper for your oleave one of your hasband's cards as well as one of your own. Whether in address single be exprayed upon the visiting card or not is a souter of choice. It certainly is an easy way to let your friends know just where you reside.

J. S. H.—Wedding invinations should be engraved upon heavy, dead-withe, dull-finished paner, and should be enclosed in envelopes to match, and arbitrossed simply, Mr. or Mrs. ——. These, unwaited, should again be enclosed in an outer envelope upon which the full name and address should be written.

H. E. A. – There are several dramatic schools in New York city, but we cannot undertake to give their ad-dresses. Neither can we advise any gift to leave her house and study for the stage. Very few girls succeed in making a living in the protession; the prizes are few and the risks of such a life great.

ALLISUTON—It is quite proper to eat lee cream with fork. (2) Questions about kisses cannot be inswered a thus department. (3) We should not neries you to ske a gentleman to call upon you; if he wishes to do so e should not your permission. (4) Do not give your belonging by our permission.

CHENTRY GERK.—An order sent by mall to any one of the large dry goods establishments in our large cities will be altereded to if accompanied by a money order check or guarantee that the person sending the order, is reliable. In all large shops persons are employed whose sole histores it is to attend to orders sent by REABER—All appointments under the United States Criff Service Law are made for a probationary period of six mostles, at the end of which time, if the conduct and capacity of the persons appointed have been found anti-factory, their appointments are made absolute. Women are as eligible as men to appointment under the Civil Service rules.

Hor Searnos—The precious stones appropriate to persons born in the several months are: Jamosty, the garnet: February, the amethyst: March, the bloodstone; April, the dimmod; May, the emerald; June, the again; July, the rule; I acques, the sardonyx; September, the supplier: October, the opal; November, the topaz; December, the turquotse.

P. T.—When a widow marries again abe should not wear a while goes, no matter how claborate she may desire the ceremony to be. It is always in good taste upon surdi occasions to have the telebration as quiet as possible, and to this end the bride aboutd herself con-tribute by wearing a goest of some quiet color and by dispensing with bridesmalds.

Giomostrows - Mardt graz, which are French words signifying "fig. Theselay," was introduced in New Orients by the French residents in that city in 187. The same "Komus." the king who presides over the festivities of the "mysik's crewe," was undoubtedly de-rived from the delty called "Comus" in the Greek my-thology, who was the god of mirth.

Sources, who was the good of nileth.

Sources,—To destroy the insects to your hird's care unish the perches and the cage theroughly with carbodic scap and but water; cleanliness is the best preventive of this irrubite. Some bird fanciers keep a small bug of aniphur suspended in the cages in which birds subject to this trouble are kept. They claim that the sulphur will destroy the insects without affecting the health of the birds.

F. C. R.—The "keystone" is the middle stone of an arch, which, when slipped into place completes the archand gives stability to it. Pennsylvania is called the "Keystone State" from its harring been the central state of the Union at the time of the forming of the Constitution. If the manies of the thirteen states should be arranged to the forms of an arch, Pennsylvania would occupy the place of the keystone.

Luxy At a business college where shorthand is taught, it is calculated that it will take at least a year for a girl to become profited enough to be able to fill an office position with credit to herself. Practice is necessary, and is the only thing that will ensure speed and correctness in this work, both of which are absolutely necessary to success. Wages paid stenographers vary in the different crities, and are spt to be uneven; the lowest paid are $5 per neck.

ANNETTE—The order of "The Daughters of the Ring," and "The International Order of King's Daughters and Sons," are two entirely separate and distinct organisations, the latter being the other society. The badge of the "Daughters of the King" is a cross of silver, a Greek cross, and its monto" For His Sake," Its colors are white and blue. It is distinctively Episcopal. The "Order of King's Daughters and Sons" is a Christian but not a sectarian order.

Wastrean. The Rev. Mr. Smith is not a correct address any more than Dr. Mr. Smith would be. Always use the Christian name, as for instance, Rev. John Smith. When the Christian name is unknown substitute a dash. When speaking to a clergyman address him as Mr. or Br. (If he has a degree). When introducing time follow the same plan. A clergyman's garb will usually indicate his profession. (2) Araansas, by sinte law, is pronounced "Ar-kan-saw."

MADOR—We cannot or rather we will not print the "postage stamp language," for the reason that we consider it silly in the extreme. The only position for a postage stamp on mall matter is the upper right-hand corner. Do not be guilty of anything so unladylike as transmitting, or attempting to transmit, a message through the placing of a postage stamp where it will tasse amonguace to the post-office employees, and also place your correspondent in a very ridiculous position.

FRANCESCA—The Mangaret Looisa Home at New York was founded by Mrs. Elliet Shepard, and is largely supported by the Vanderdalk family. It is located if if and if East Egissecule Street, New York City, under the care of the Young Women's Christian Association, and is intensed to be a temperary little for Pretestant source. The rooms are moders of weathers and consider, the month are good and the prices charged very moderate. Neither children nor invalide will be admitted.

J. L. The proper way for a gentleman to acknowl-ize a gift from a lady would be in some such form as MY DEAR MINE.

WEDNESHAY,
June twenty-second, 1892.

A. E. B.—If the room on the septial floor can be arranged satisfactority it should be used for the ladder' discussing room; the gratienter will not mind the extra pair of stairs. The lostess should not dance until the sees that her guests are all supplied with partners, and even then not mises size is needed to make up a set. The duties of a basiess are very exacting, and her one desire should be to see that her guests are well enterprised, and the size cannot not if engaged to dancing. Sames should not be amounted at an evening party, nor alsoid good byes be said. The guests upon exerting are met to the hosters and welcomed, but on leaving they quietly withdraw. It will be quite correct for you to give a standing supplier; the chairs may be taken from the disting room of it is small, god the gestlemen may be absent to said the waltern in serving the refreshments.

Miss, J. R. and Oprikus, In order to "make a start in advertisement writing" we should advise the study in the measurement writing we should advise the study in the measurement of make aftertising really is. Then the preparation of a make a decribing really is. Then the preparation of a make of special carries ments should be arranged existently and caternity, and also as close as possible to the firm in which it is included they shall be used. This preparation should be fishered by a personal visit to the firms in your councity who are large aftertises, and who are always so the tookout for now also. The Digies that have been sent as in this connection have been only fairly good, and set was to the standard required. There is no rocal and set we for earling a Declined, each person must find it for berself, keeping in mind the one great feet that the advertisement of freed must be admirative, and indicative of maste that can only be filled by the portune of the articles advertised.

FACE HANDS HAIR

THE clearest skin, free from pimple, spot or blemish, the softest, whitest hands and shapely nails, the most luxuriant hair and cleanest scalp are produced by the celebrated Cuticura Soap, beyond all comparison the most effective skin-purifying and beautifying soap in the world, as well as the purest and sweetest of toilet and nursery soaps. It is the only preventive of pimples, blackheads, blotches, red, rough and oily skin, because the only preventive of inflammation and clogging of the pores, the cause of most complexional disfigurations, as well as baby blemishes. For red, rough hands, shapeless nails, itching, burning palms and painful finger ends, it is absolutely unrivalled. It clears the scalp and hair of crusts, scales and dandruff, soothes and heals irritated and itching surfaces, stimulates the hair follicles, and supplies the roots with energy and nourishment. Hence for the prevention of facial blemishes, for giving a brilliancy and freshness to the complexion, for softening and whitening the hands, and for cleansing the scalp and invigorating the hair, it is simply incomparable.

Cuticura Soap

Cuticura, the great Skin Cure, but so delicately are they blended with the purest of toilet and nursery soap stocks, that the result is incomparably superior to all other skin and complexion soaps, while rivaling in delicacy and surpassing in purity the most expensive of toilet and nursery soaps. Because of its delicate medication it is the most soothing, cooling and purifying application for summer rashes, tan, sunburn, freckles and bites and stings of insects. Sale greater than the combined sales of all other skin and complexion soaps.

HOT WEATHER HUMORS

Summer, when the pores open freely, is the best time to permanently cure diseases of the Skin and Scalp, with Loss of Hair. More great cures are daily made by the Cuticura Remedies than by all other skin and blood remedies combined. They afford immediate relief in the most torturing and disfiguring eruptions, humors and diseases, and point to a permanent and economical (because most speedy) cure, when the best physicians and all other remedies fail. Everything about the Cuticura Remedies invites confidence. They are absolutely pure, and agreeable to the most refined and sensitive. They are adapted to all ages, and may be used on the youngest in ant. They have friends in every village, hamlet, and cross-roads in this country. People in every walk of life believe in them, use them and recommend them. In a word, they are the greatest skin cures, blood purifiers, and humor remedies of modern times.

CUTICURA REMEDIES are sold throughout the world. Price, CUTICURA, the great Skin Cure, 50 cents; CUTICURA SOAP, 25 cents; CUTICURA RESOLVENT, the new Blood Purifier, $1.00. Prepared by the POTTER DRUG AND CHEMICAL CORPORATION, HOSTON.

OCTOBER DAYS

BY EVA A. MADDEN

OUT in the field is the golden-rod, Waving and bending its yellow plumes; White is the silk in the milk-weed pod, In the yellow days of October.

Crimson are trees of the forest land, Berries hang red on the climbing vines, Maples are touched by a golden hand, And the nuts are ripe in their brownness.

Close to the grass are the asters white, Brown on the ground lie the fallen leaves, Circling around summer's birds take flight And the quails whirr up near the fences.

Over the land is the autumn haze;

Slowly at eve comes the seat, round moon;

Silent and sweet are the country ways

In the golden days of October.

"She was a very pretty sinner."

CLAD IN DOUBLET AND HOSE

By May Kelsey Champion

walked alone, with slow steps and downcast glance. "She demeans berself modestly."

Then to the widow, "I will examine her between the two services. I doubt not she be sound and orthodox in her fundamentals."

A short curve took Ursula beyond the sight of those who followed. The joy and gladness of the morning were gone now. It was as if all things drooped under the heaviness of the sermon. Ursula was weary, and her steps

Ursula was weary, and her steps

HE little band of worshipers turned their steps down the narrow path leading from the meeting-house. Just a handful of men, strong and stern, and of women, serene and placid, all with the gravity of demeanor and showness of step which be-fitted a Lord's day morning in the middle sixteens, in in the land of the Sober Dissenters.

Dissenters.
It was only the young people who had gathered about the door, the young men of the guard and the young women with the searlet and blue petticoats. "Marked you the stranger?" asked one, as he rested his musket against the horse-

Who is he?"

"Troth, and I know not."

"Troth, and I know not."

"They do say a ruling Elder from one of the New Haven plantations," volunteered another, a young man who had just come down from the look-out post on the top.

"From whose church or ministry I know no more than the rest. But see, Ursula, he is going home with your mother to mid-day meal. He spent last night at the ordinary. Jonathan Rudd saw him riding along the common way past the fort a little before the sun-setting."

The young girl whom they called Ursula

sun-setting."

The young girl whom they called Ursula glanced back at the deacon's pen.

"Hush! he is looking," she said, "and it has been told and repeated to us that 'tis a sin. exceeding scandalous and dreadful to be talk-ing in the meeting-house porch on the Sabbath. Anthony Bassacres wants a second ser-mon to the purpose, it is clear," and with another curious glance at the stranger with the forbidding face, who was certainly coming with her mother, she turned and passed with for mother, see turned and passed through the paling a little before them.

These two, the Widow Priden and her guest, walked slowly on, in serious discourse of the morning lesson.

"Yes, truly; it was sound in doctrine, very manna for the lovers of Zion, and, we will have a solonow warmen to the lovers of the lovers.

very manina for the forers of Zeon, and, we will hope, a solemn warning to sinful sons of Korah." The Elder, as he spoke, trod with a barsh crunch upon an aut-hill that was building in the path, and frowned in severe condemnation at the little insects flering in all directions from their Sunday labor.

"Your daughter?" besaid, after a little, as he watched the young girl before them.

Ursula.

"Ursula."
"It trust she is well founded in doctrine."
"It is my custom to catechise her daily in the Scriptures," replied the widow, a note of satisfaction in her words. New Haven church should find small matter for criticism as to that in her family.
"Truly, the maid has a seemly carriage," thought the Elder, as Ursula joined none of the young people who had overtaken her, but

By the side of the foot-path a wild-rose blossom bent its head under the scorching heat of the sun. She stretched out her hand with a gentle caress, and the flower, grateful for the unwonted touch, broke from its stalk and remained in her fingers. Poor Ursula! "Verily, it is not as I deemed," thought the

"Verily, it is not as I deemed," thought the Elder, as the path having straightened again, his stern eye beliefed the motion.

"She is easily enticed and drawn away by the frivolities of the world, if such wanton picking be not an actual profanation of the Sabbath. It needs be that I add a chastise-ment to the catechism." But reaching the Widow Priden's house-lot by this, he made no reference to the offense for the time.

Usula's mother overed her best from for

thrown over his head as a barrier against argumentative and anti-Christian flies, was soon lost in a deep and heavy reflection.

Ursula took a pewter drinking cup from a hook in the kitchen and ran upstairs to her own small loft.

Poor little Sunday rose! Was it, too, weighed down with a sense of the wrath and judgments it was pulling down upon itself? She placed it tenderly in the water, smoothing its drooping leaves and wondering if it, more than she, knew how to "curb its proud humors," as the minister bad charged.

But "Ursula! Ursula!" her mother's voice was calling below, and with another loving touch she left it and went down.

"You waste much time, Ursula. The Elder

"You waste much time, Ursula. The Elder will observe that the sin of the sluggard is sore upon you. Here, child, the silver spoons, not the alchemy, and the pewter trenches. It must be that he is hungry, for the victualing at the ordinary is none of the best," "Visitors were rare enough to the Sayberole at the ordinary is none of the best."

Visitors were rare enough to the Saybrook colony, and this was a guest of such distinction that the widow moved about with a haste that was almost week-day and wicked.

"Now a dish of fresh water from the spring, and all is ready. Where is the other drinking cup, Ursula?"

Ursula rested the water jur on the door step before emptying it. "There are two on the books, and I do not care for water." she said. Then, as her mother still searched the dresser, "It is in my room."

The Widow Priden placed the two upon the table and turned to her danghter. It was not well when the Widow Priden was displeased, "Indeed! Our parcel of worldly goods is then grown to so great measure in this wilderness place that we already have to remove a part of them to the loft above!" she said. "Bring it down, Ursula, and let us have no more such carelessness."

"But, truly, mother, I am not thirsty, and more such carelessness."

"But, truly, mother, I am not thirsty, and the rose which I plucked coming home will Ursula had not known that her mother's Ursula had not known that her mother's brows were so black or her form so tall.

"Would a man harvest his wheat on the Sabtath?" she continued, as the blue eyes fell back to the water jar. "And your own doings are but of a piece. Go to your room, child, and it to be hoped that under the humbling from so of conscience you will come to a better spirit. I must speak to the Elder about you."

Ursula's pretty eyes filled with tears, but she would not lay the blame on the rose. It had grown to have a soul, too, with her now, and she felt that it breathed out a tender, sweet sympathy with the fragrance which had filled her room.

sweet sympathy with the inagrance which as filled her room.

She threw herself on the bed, and only a few of the tears escaped down her cheeks, for she was soon lost in a light sleep. It must have been but a short time after, though it might have been hours, when she heard the steels moving away from the table.

might have been hours, when she heard the stools moving away from the table.

Raising her head, she listened.

"As a seed which might bring forth a harvest of evil it is a matter of no small concernment," the Elder was saying, "I will speak with the maid. Tis not likely the deed was one of high-handed presumption, but, more like, only of mawakenedness to the true sense of the transgression."

What a thin high pitched voice he had—very sense of the transgression."

What a thin high-pitched voice he had—very disagreeable! She had scarcely heard it before. And now it was her mother:

"I have done my best endeavor to breed up in learning such family as the Father of Mercies has blessed me withal, but I will deem it kindness if you will speak as you say." And Ursula heard herself called again. She rose and went down, her face flushed from her sleep, and her yellow hair escaping about her forehend in tendrils truly way wand and non-dissenting—a very pretty sinner indeed, as she went into the best room, where the Elder waited for her.

deed, as she went into the best room, where the Elder waited for her.

It may have been that behind the rugged brow, seamed with its perpetual frown, that thought crept in, even though it was the Sab-bath-day, as Ursula, with downcast eyes and very pink cheeks, stood before him reciting her catechism.

She knew it well, answering without slip, and the Elder's face grow has wretze though

She knew it well, answering without slip, and the Elder's face grew less severe, though she did not see, studying the marks of the axe on the floor timbers.

He had been listening to a growing temptation to lighten the chastisement when the drum sounded for the afternoon meeting, and now it would be necessary to defer it altogether. The transgression seemed not so enormous with the transgressor before him, lifting her great blue eyes to his now.

"Yes, child; go and make yourself pre-pared," he replied to her unspoken question.
"Your hair a little—smoother," he added, doubtfully.

The poor little rose rested all night in the pewter drinking cup without bringing more trouble to Ursula. It was as if it had never been. Neither was the subject renewed in the

"It was indeed a strange wedding."

"I find your daughter having a competency of knowledge in the principles of religion," the Elder had said to the Widow Priden the night before, "but she needs discipline—wise discipline, lest through innovertency she become entangled in the net of worldly tempta-

Yes?" the widow said slowly in question She had thought to have performed faithfully all those duties of instruction and humiliation It might be that she had grown a little proud, even, with her approving conscience.

"I deem it not necessary that it be too severe," the Elder continued; "for it appears that she is in an humble and repentant spirit now, but I will privilege myself to administer it if it be your wish."

The Widow Priden would have preferred to assume the responsibility herself, but the clurch officer sat waiting and she assented with what courtesy she could.

Having taken the heaviness of the responsi-bility, the Etder gave binuself to considering the way in which be should do his duty. It was clear that the sin should not go unheeded, was clear that the sin should not go unheeded, and before he slept he had determined upon several severities. But in the morning again, as he watched Ursula deftly putting the table in order for the morning meal, he found that all his incilination toward them had fled.

"A fair maid and a handy," he mused, as Ursula lightly lifted a kettle of steaming Indian from the trammel, "Truly a woman's gentle ways are pleasant in a household. Adjani's steps are heavy, and she sore needeth a mistress."

The breakfast had been a dreaded occasion to Ursula, but it passed without happening, and as soon as possible after she ment to the spring, in the hope that her mother's guest would have left before her return. He had already ordered his horse brought round from the ordinary.

It was cool and beautiful under the trees, and Ursula threw herself on the grass, still dewy though it was, her arm under her head. She coaxed a blackbird in its own notes to answer her, and it was not sliy. The spot was so apart, and human visitors so infrequent, that it had not learned to fear. Raising her head she looked up at the sky. "When the sun climbs to the top of the tall tree by the wading place, I will go back," she said aloud, as the bird flew off. "He must have set out by then."

Meantime, of course it was sinful but it was very delightful to be idle, and to be idle just here; so, sinking back into the mass she listened to the spring marmaring of its great ambitions. It was really going somewhere— out of the Saybrook colony into the great river, the sound, the ocean.

A crackling of the underbrush aroused her. A cracking of the underprism arouses for.

Perhaps it was Jonathan Radd going home;
he was one of the watch last night. They often happened to meet of late when she came in the morning for water. She wondered why they never used. He would think her very idle, and with sudden haste she caught up her in and placed it under the spring.

her jar and placed it under the spring.

But it was a horse's footfall, and Ursula turned to see before her a figure that had grown unpleasantly familiar, with its buck's eather doublet, darnex waistcont and green knit hose—the Elder himself.

He drew up his horse by the spring.
"Ursula, I have somewhat to say to thee before leaving." he said, bending his tall figure under an obstructing branch. "After grave consideration, and according to my best wisdoms and light, I deem it the Lord's will that we should marry."

"But," began Ursula, all frightened and wonder-eyed and shrinking from any nearness to the rider, "but I do not—"

"Yes, I know," said the Elder, "You would say that you do not walk in righteousness and are grown to a great beight of implety; 'tis but natural. But it is not because you are already good that I take you, Ursula. 'Tis to aid in the furtherance of your goodness."

It was difficult for even a ruling Elder of a New Haven plantation to look long with severity upon the golden head, bowed under a ray of sunlight which had struggled down through the tree-tops, and, conscious of a most unnatural disturbance beneath his dar-nex waistcost, he made baste to ride on.

"It must be that I go further, now," he said, drawing his borse from the sassafras growth upon which it was browsing, "but if there be no Providential hindrance, I shall be in the Saybrook again come six months or less, when the marriage covenant shall be solemnized. Meantime, it shall be my petition that your backslidings may be healed," and threading his long, thin fingers through his horse's rein, the Elder rode down the path.

Ursula gazed after him. So startled and bewildered she was that the water rushed over the sides of the jar and into the pool beneath unborded. She did not even hear another rustling among the bushes, and not until there came a quick step and familiar voice by her side, did she turn. "What said the Elder to you, Ursula, that should cause you to look as if you had seen some twenty skulking Indians?

Even Jonathan Rudd's honest face could not reassure her, and she answered rather to satisfy herself that the words were real, than in reply to his question.

He said that in six-months, he was coming to- to marry me.

And what did you say?" he asked, peering through the trees as if they had not long since hidden horse and rider.

"I-I am not sure that I replied at all." said Ursula, by no means certain of anything except a sort of protection in Jonathan's scowl. "I think he did not expect it. It is to be a furthernnee toward my perfecting, he said: beause I am grown to so great height of impiety. O Jonathan, it is very bad to be it?" asked Johnathan, quietly. should think it might be -- very." Then, after a little: "I think you are much too wicked for the Elder, Ursula; much too great a wrong-doer for him to make effort to reform." A tear fell into the spring as Ursula turned

A tear fell into the spring as Ursula turned her face from him.

"And you, too, find me so—so abounding in sin," she said,

Then Jonathan took her in his great, strong arms. He could not be amused; her self-condemning was too pathetic.

"O, Ursula, Ursula," he said, smoothing the hair from the white forehead. "Have you broken all the Commandments at once, that you accuse yourself so; you could not be happy with the Elder?" he asked suddenly, a new thought throbbing in his brain, and the inniner trees recling before him. jumper trees reciting before him.
"Jonathan, I should die!" And as Ursula's

"Jonathan, I should die!" And as Ursun's hands were not free her face could hide itself only in Jonathan's honest brown jerkin.

"One need be prepared," he marmured, under his breath. "Some do not stick to say that he trents his creatures better than his wives, two having died already with the hard work." Then drawing her to him. "Peoplis work." Then drawing her to him: "Poor lit-tle girl!" he said. "Ursula, this world would be all a desert place to me without you. Could you deem it full with me alone?"

Only Jonathan could have caught the single syllable that was all her reply, but he repeated "Ursula, Ursula," as if there were never half so sweet a name before.

never half so sweet a name before.

And all the time the water was running over the jar into the brook and away; the sun had climbed far above the tree by the wading place—and still they stayed.

"To night I will speak to your mother," said Jonathan, when at last they turned back toward the bouse, "but I do not see it cause and case of necessity that the proposal of the Eiler be mentioned, do you? She might not believe you, so exceeding great a sinner as you are," he added, and this time Ursula looked up and smiled a little, too.

The days sped on; the leaves grew large and fell; chill evenings with their blazing sunsets of crimson, and gold, and blue, and green fol-lowed close; and then the greyness of all things—the pallor of death which sorrowing nature makes haste to cover with her snowy winding-sheet. In their hearts the people of the Saybrnok colony yearned for England. Excepting Ursula Priden and Jonathan Rudd. Upon Jonathan, the Widow Priden had always looked with favor. Being pos-sessed of a competent farm, and carrying good behavior in his course of life, she saw no reason to deny him the hand of Ursula, she said.

to deny ham the hand of Ursula, she said.

And Ursula spun and was happy and sang, and longed not at all for the soft air and cleared fields of Fenny Compton, where the leaves were still green and the birds singing.

No one did his postures on training day so well as Jonathan. No one's wheat or mislen well as Jonathan. No one's wheat or mislen grew so tall or so full as his. And, surely, they were never so safe from the Indians as on those Sumlays when he stood in the look-out on the roof of the meeting-house.

So the autumn passed, and Ursula spun and was happy. The linen piled itself up in the chest to such height that all the women in the plantation came to see Ursula Priden's wondrous fitting-out.

Ten pairs of linen sheets, went the report.

As for Jonathan Rudd, they did say that he had sent to England even, for hangings for the best room, of dark green, say, they were to be, it was reported, but no doubt he would have considered Mr. Fenwick's landscape bangings, or even the ones of Cresar or Susanna none too good for the Widow Priden's daughter, if he could have had them.

But Jonathan knew. A picture had been in his heart all these last weeks. When he broke the high drifts for the cart path, when he kept the watch at night, always there was before him a young girl in a red cloth petti-cost, standing beside the dark green of the junipers, and he did not count it extravagance to includge himself thus far. He paid his rates regularly—no one could deny that.
All things were nearly ready for the wedding. The purpose of contract had been read from the pulpit, and the contract itself drawn six days ago. Only the day after to-morrow now, and then the marriage covenant.

Ursula sat by the fire place, paring squares of pumpkin for the festival pies, and wondering if she would forget to answer when people called her Mistress Rudd. Would it not seem very strange? The fire from the great six foot log blazed and roared as the wind rose out-

But she drew the large settle nearer the chimney, and went back to her paring, listen-ing the while that she might not miss the first sound of a possible footfall,

It came soon, and Ursula hastened to the

"It was so late, Jonathan, that I was fearing you would not come," she said, as she helped him out of his snowy cloak. "Come to the fire. How cold you are!"

"I have been on a long journey, Ursula." Where, Jonathan?

"To the Pequot plantation, to see Mr. Winthrop. I had discomforting news this Jonathan watched her as she sifted the yellow Indian through her fingers and turned

"You are a thoughtful Ursula," he said,
"I did not know that I was bungry until

She drew a table to his side, and after pluc-ing upon it a pitcher of milk and a bowl of the Indian, sat down again to her work, saying nothing until he had finished.

Now tell me what news you have," she said, when she had taken away the dishes. "It may be that it is not so had as it seemed, or will not be so heavy with two to bear it."

"I fear it might make trouble for both of us," Jonathan said, drawing his band slowly across his forehead. He was very tired, true enough—Jonathan. "I saw Humpbrey Tracy this morning. He had been up to Hartford town, trucking some cattle, and the drifts up along the river are very bad, he says. So deep, already, were they yesterday, that the magistrate sent message by him that if more snow fell during the day he should not be able to come down Thursday, as was his purpose."
"Indeed, a drift need rise to no great height

"Indeed, a drift need rise to no great height to cover him, or to fright him, either, they say true," said Ursula, as she picked up a paring from the floor. "But the snow will melt, I suppose, Jonathan."

"Moreover," he continued, reaching across and taking from her the basin and knife, "moreover, Humphrey Tracy told me—I can do this as well as you, Ursula—that the Elder ourneyed with him as far as Tunxis, and said his intendment was for coming here when the his intendment was for coming here when the atorm was done. Being told that the magistrate was like to come also he said he would make effort to join him."

Ursula's eyes grew troubled. She really feared the man. Truly her backslidings could by no means be healed with this more than by no means be heated with this more than usually unboly aversion in her heart.

"And you journeyed in all the storm to the Pequot colony!" she said. "You charge yourself with too great pains, Jonathan, and I am very cowardly to be afraid. It is not a very brave wife you will have."

Ursula clasped her hands over her knees, and studied the fire. She was riad that Jonathan studied the fire. She was glad that Jonathan was so strong and intrepol. How he stood half a head above the other young men of the plantation. And yet how goulde be was when he lifted her over the drifts or across the

"Mr. Winthrop said be was sorry to deny us, but, being under the Massachusetts becould not marry in this plantation."

Another silence followed, and a longer.
"The fire grows low, Ursula." Jonathan said

"I will bring more wood.

Returning with a heavy stick, he threw it upon the dogs.

"It is cleared," he said, as he raked the burning coals toward the front. "The moon is just rising." And, going back to the settle, he watched the log, hissing and steaming, as the sop boiled out, then breaking into flames when hits of the burk dried and caught the

"Ursula," be said, after a long time, when the stick was fairly ablaze and the flames coaring up the wide chimney, "Ursula, would you be willing to go to the Pequot plantation? It is through a long tract of wilderness and a dismal; but Mr. Winthrop, though he saw it necessary to dear us the coming here, agreed necessary to deny us the coming here, agreed to meet us at the stream which the Indians call Sunkipang, if we sent message that we

"I am more afraid of him who will come with the magistrate than of all the Indians between here and the Pequot," she said. "And who was it, Jonathan, last training day who broke with a bullet the shuft of the arrow that the Indian had shot up into the tall pine by the mere-stones?

"But it will be a strange wedding for my little girl, that is had out of doors and at such journey," he said, smoothing the hand he

"Well, is not the whiteness the very thing for brides?" she asked, stoutly, though her heart fell as she thought of the pretty wedding gown which could never go so many miles on a pillion. "You men ask for so many things a pillion. together."

There was a light in Jonathan's face.

"Then I will send Humphrey Tracy's serving man at sun-up to-morrow with a message to Mr. Winthrop," he said. "His going and coming will make the track the better for any light of the said. us, and by day after to-morrow the snow may have packed a little as well. The drifts were very deep to-night, and it being too dark to see the marked trees, I had like to have lost my way in one Ursula shivered and drew nearer him.

"Ah, Jonathan, I am glad you are here by the fireplace and me."

"The howling of wolves after sun-down is not the most cheering music, in truth. I don't deny but I'd rather hear old Windham lined out on a Sabbath with Goodman Guil lam's voice to the fore. But I must leave this fireplace and you now—see how the candle is burned down." And Jonathan moved the settle back against the wall.

"You are my own brave Ursula," he said, as he stood by the door with his rough brown coat wrapped well about him, "my own brave Ursula," lifting her face in both his hands, "But the mare is safe, and I will see to it that she knows how precious is the burden she will carry Widow Priden made no objection to the riding to Pequot. "It would not be her choice the going to the magistrate," she said, "but if Jonathan wished it, and Ursula had no fear nor dismayedness at the journey, she was not one to say may. They did say it was an ill omen to put off a marriage, and nobody could tell when the drifts up along the river

Brave as she was, a tear was folded in with the wedding gown as Ursula laid it away in its box. Not that for the long ride to the Pequot. Her warmest skirt of searlet cloth and the dark-blue bood and cloak, very common clothes for a bride, but Jonathan did not look as though be minded when he came for

It was, as he had told her, a long and dismal way. Only occasionally did the sun penetrate the close beauches so that they felt its warmth, and the cry of the wolves often came too near

"Are you cold, Ursula? or afraid?" Jonathan turned in his saddle to ask at every few

"Not afraid," she said; "and how could I be cold with such broad shoulders between me and the wind!" "I fear 'twill be all the worse for you coming back," he said, and opened his cont that it might shelter her better. Men were strong— he could hear a little cold.

"The wind may change by that," said Ursula, langhing. "Why, this is a great day, Jonathan! Everything is for us."

But it was long, and they had grown thoroughly chilled before they rounded a large drift which had turned the path, and saw in front of them the little stream to which Mr. Winthrop had promised to come.

There were several men on the opposite bank, and Ursula grew alarmed. "Is the ningistrate among them, Jonathan?" she asked, with a hand on the rein.

Jonathan peered through the branches.
"I think the musk-colored doublet is his.

See—close in front of him with the bundoleers. Yes; that is Mr. Winthrop." They made the best way they could down the bank, following the shallows of the drifts, for the snow had blown since yesterday, and the tracks were covered.

As they reached the stream Jonathan ex-claimed in dismay: "We cannot cross, Ursula. See-the ice is broken and floating in great cakes. We cannot cross It was quite as bad further up, they found, and in much perplexity they came back to the great drift opposite the magistrate and his friends.

"Tis a pity, 'tis a pity you cannot cross,' be said, raising his voice to them as he come down to the edge of the stream on his side. "But the wise, step-ordering Providence has broke the ke since yesterday, and I see no place where it would be safe to venture." Mr. Winthrop turned to bim of the bando-leers and leather buskins with something which Jonathan and Ursula could not hear, Then, after some conversation among them, he again lifted his voice to those on the other

If you could manage to go up a piece to the place where the land juts out into the water, youder," he said, pointing with his staff in that direction, "I might make shift to marry you there. "Twould be saily discomforting to have taken the long journey for records."

Mr. Winthrop is very good to be at so at pains for us," said Jonathan, as they got great pains for us," said Jonathan, as they got down from the saddle, and, stiffened from the cold and the constrained position, made their way out on the narrow bank, which was so slippery and uneven as well. "Take care, my Ursula, not there!" as she tried to make a footing on an jey hillock.

It was, indeed, a strange wedding-the magistrate on one side of the frozen stream, and they on the other, the world all white about them. The solemn stillness which is as if the earth were bowed before the body temple had come upon the place. Nothing could be beard but the chafing of the great cakes in the channel, or now an occasional sharp report which left a long fissure in the ice over the meadow. They stood for a moment with heads rever-ently bowed. Then Mr. Winthrop's words came clear and grave upon the frosty air, and soon, with kind wishes for the strong and stout-hearted young settler and the girl by his side to click! side, so slight and brave, the magistrate and Ursula was lifted to the saddle a little more tenderly, and Jonathan spread his cont that it might shelter her a little better than before-that was alt. He could wait until they reached home, and it was best to ride quickly, for it would be very cold soon.

"See Jonathan the wind has really

"See, Jonathan, the wind has really changed!" cried Ursuin, gaily, when they had ridden a short distance. "Did I not speak true when I said that to-day is all for us?"

"Verily, Ursula, you have cast a spell upon it, it is clear." And Jonathan said little more on the lowerce, but he hastened the arrest of

The great red fire in the west was flaming up to meet the sun, and the light came low and slanting when he drew up at his own door. Fastening the reins around a tree inside the paling, he gently lifted Ursula from the saddle and carried her into the house—into the room where were the hangings of green bay. As she stood there in her gown of soft scarlet cloth, as he had so often dreamed she scared ciota, as he and so often dreamed she might stand—so shy in the midst of her new surroundings, Jonathan's heart was very full.

"Ah, Ursula, it shall be summer and sun-shine for us always now," he said, "no matter though the trees by the spring be brown and bent with the snow,"

THE JOURNAL'S MUSICAL PRIZES

THE series of prizes for the best musical I compositions, announced in the last (September) issue of THE LADIES' HOME JOURNAL, has met with such pronounced public response as to give promise of the complete success of the Journant's venture, prize compositions will, in all probability, result in becoming the most popular songs, waltzes and hymn-tunes ever issued by a periodical. It should be borne in mind that the series is open until November 1st, 1892, and any composer resident in the United States and the Dominion of Canada has an States and the Dominion of Chinas Pas are opportunity to win the prizes. A circular giving full information about the prizes will be sent to my address by application to

FOUNDED BY A WOMAN

By Maude Haywood

ROBABLY there is no distinctively native industry of which Americans have more right to feel proud than that being so successfully carried on at the Rookwood Pottery in Cincinnati. It is a standing testimony to two important facts in the development of the national life and character. In the first place, being entirely local in origin and growth, it is in itself a decisive proof of the real existence of an artistic element essentially American. And secondly, in having been founded by a woman, it is a witness to the important and netive share taken by women in the work of this country, a privilege peculiarly American, and not paralleled except in comparatively rare instances in the nations of the Old World. On the other hand, the proudest boast of Rookwood is that in no sense can the manufactory be suid to owe anything of the principles of its existence to outside sources. Its development and growth, as in all true life, has been from within, although the founders have, of course, from time to time, as it seemed expedient, made use of foreign talent or profited by the discoveries and experience of foreign art. Hence an originality and an individuality in the work produced impossible under any other conditions, and thereby, also, has the pottery claimed and proved its right to existence on the highest and truest art principles. Asking nothing from without, and employing for material clay brought from their own Ohio watershed, shaped into simple but artistic forms, decorated with flowers nodeled direct from nature and enriched with those wonderful and now well-known glazes, in less than ten years from ROBABLY there is no distinctively native industry with those wonderful and now well-known glazes, in less thanten years from its foundation this hitherto comparatively its foundation this hitherto comparatively obscure pottery bore away the honors of an international exhibition, and commanded the wonder and admiration of Europe, where the vases there shown for the first time bore their part in an added revolution to the Old World of the unguessed at powers and possibilities of American industrial art.

The situation and exterior of the

The situation and exterior of the original pottery were, perhaps, about as unsuggestive of the work carried on within the walls of the factory as any place could possibly be. Although the city of Cincinnati has gained for itself the reputation of being the art city of tesque or humorous, some of Caldecott's drawings having been utilized with happy effect. Occasionally small animals such as field mice, and also insects, are introduced, being likewise treated naturally, but the reproductions given here may be regarded as typical of the best and most characteristic of the Rookwood decorated pieces. It must, however, be remembered that in reality the glory of the ware lies greatly in the beauty of the color and glaze, which is impossible to adequately represent in black and white, however accurately the designs may be rendered. represent in black and wante, however necurately the designs may be rendered, as in the present instance. A fact of which the pottery may justly boast is, that not only is the rule adhered to that no piece should ever be duplicated, but also the standard of excellence is kept very kirch each piece being the subject of

also the standard of excellence is kept very high, each piece being the subject of individual study, and made as perfectly as possible.

The story of the origin and rise of the pottery, which is nowadays widely known, is not only interesting but should be both instructive and inspiring to the country of its foundress, Mrs. Maria Longworth Storer. It is often said, and well said, that what has been done may be done again. In the history of Rookwood the principles and reasons of its success may be very readily traced. It is undoubted that the key-note to that success lay in the first instance in Mrs. Storer's personal character. She is an artist by nature, with an intense love for the work which she undertook, and which grew up so wonderfully in her hands. She comes of one of the old Cincinnati families, whose history may truly be said to be bound up in the life and interests of the city itself. She received her art training originally at the local art academy, which said to be bound up in the life and interests of the city itself. She received her art training originally at the local art academy, which owed much to the patronage and bounty of her father, Mr. Longworth. Unlike many other, rich American women, Mrs. Storer preferred the pursuit of art to any other occupation or amusement, and she had the opportunity and means of gratifying her tastes. Without any idea of the ultimate development of her scheme she started to make pottery, simply for her own enjoyment, in a small school-house, no longer required for its original purpose, situated as before described on Eastern Avenne, in Cincinnati. Only a few were at first associated with her, and they were greatly aided by a perctical potter, Mr. Bailey, who has continued in the works ever since, through all its rise and growth. It is not to be wondered at that he seems to recall with especial affection memories connected with the early days of the manufactory. Although almost from the first the ware was sold, and the enterprise conducted on business principles, yet it will be seen that the undertaking was started and carried on more for and in a love of the art than from any and carried on more for and in a love of the art than from any mercenary consideration. The same spirit has been maintained to a greater or less extent down to the present day, and is a further explanation of the well-merited success of the pottery. Later, as the business grew and widened so greatly, Mrs. Storer gradually withdrew from the more active management of it, contenting herself with using her interest and influence in the art department, to which the president of the pottery, Mr. W. W. Taylor, who joined himself to its interests in 1883, attaches no small value, attributing much of the peculiar character of the Rookwood success to her influence as a woman and an artist. In the new building a room has been reserved for her private use in experimenting.

The pottery is now formed into a company, comprising fifteen shareholders, people not only of wealth but more or less lovers of shareholders, people not only of wealth but more or less lovers of art, who are able and willing to uphold the best interests of the manufactory, whilst not altogether neglecting the question of pecuniary benefit. The management and direction of the works are entirely in the bands of the president, Mr. Taylor, whose practical business ability, united to his artistic judgment and his enthusiasm, is manifested by the increasing prosperity of the un-dertaking. The watchword of the politery is improvement always. Experiments are being constantly made, and the day rarely passes in which consulting new is not either heaving or discovered. in which something new is not either learned or discovered

THE ETIQUETTE OF LUNCHEONS

By Mrs. Burton Kingsland

NE of the cleverest of Frenchmen defined a club as "a Paradise from which Eves are excluded." We which Eves are excluded." We will be more polite and say that a "lunch party" is the nearest feminine approach to the same kind of enjoyment that is at present open to us—in the absence of our respective Adams.

Unlike our English sisters, American women saven to be a second or severe to be a second or severe to be a second or severe to be a severe on seem to have a hearty enjoyment in each other's society. A "progressive" English girl once explained the reason of the pleasure of American women in this respect. "In your country" she said, "there are men enough to go around."

Be the reason what it may, the popularity of ladies' functions seems to demonstrate the fact, and the success of such entertainments is a foregone conclusion if a few simple rules

N the first place it is, of course, of the Is the list place it is, of course, of the highest importance to bring together people who will be congenial. A certain lady, prominent in New York society, confessed to having invited her guests "alphabetically, and so got through her list," while all are more or less tempted to ask those to whom they are indebted. But the pleasantest results seem to follow when a few people previously acquainted are brought into contact with a few new friends. The familiar faces make them optainted are brought into contact with a few new friends. The familiar faces make them feel at ease, while the new ones stimulate them to make an agreeable impression.

It is well to send the invitations for a lunch-con a week in advance. Such a time is generally sufficient to anticipate other engagements, and a longer time is apt to mise greater expectations than perhaps may be realized. I should advise a written invitation under all circumstances, a friendly, cordial little note, as spontaneous as possible. Let your friend feel her welcome in advance in its every line. Never repeat the same note, but let your friend's personality possess and inspire you. A verbal invitation takes one at a disadvantage. Your friend may have some reason for not wishing to accept, and may not have that Englishman's "courage of his opinions" who answered an invitation to dinner with: "Cannot come; have no lie ready!" not come; have no lie ready?

If you doubt your cook's ability, by all means hire one for the occasion, and preserve your peace of mind. Excellent cooks may be had in all cittes, large and small, who, for three dollars will serve a very dainty repast, and things freshly cooked in your own kitchen have a superior flavor to anythin thing sent from a caterer and warmed over. If your servant be inexperienced, write legibly on a sheet of foolscap the exact character of each course, with any directions that you may desire, and pin it up in a conspicuous place in the pantry for reference. The servant may quietly consult this before each course without taxing the memory, while the hostess may de-vote herself entirely to her guests without feeling any further responsibility.

Two persons are required to serve a table as it should be done. A waitress should wear a black dress with ample white apron, untrimmed, and a small cap—the woman's equivalent for a "dress suit."

In setting the table, more latitude is allowed in the matter of napery for a luncheon than for a dinner. "A fair white cloth" is considered to be in the best taste for the latter, while at luncheon the tablectoth may be as elaborate as desired. It is well to dispense with gas altogether if possible; the light from many wax candles is most flattering to the surroundings of table and room.

A pretty novelty for lighting the table is a large central lump with its silk shade, and four smaller ones at the corners, surmounted by similar shades made in miniature. When these are of rose-color the effect is most becoming—a thing not to be despised. The flowers are set in a circle around the central lamp.

At a formal luncheon nothing edible is

At a formal luncheon nothing edible is placed upon the table but the fruit, takes, bon-bons and "hors d'œuvres." A supplementary dish of French candied fruits or the Vienna roll wafers tied like fagots with ribbon, is very decorative. Lared papers should be interposed between all these things and the dishes containing them—except, of course,

When luncheon is announced, it is enough that the bostess rise and simply say in a gracious manner: "Ladies, luncheon is served; will you follow me?" The friend with whom the hostess is most intimate is generally given the foot of the table, and the guests she desires most to honor are seated at her right and left respectively. It is customary now for the servants to pass everything, beginning with the lady at the right and left of the hosters, and, going in opposite directions, it brings each course last to the lady of the house.

THE custom of giving favors at luncheous L has been so much overdone as to have led to the idea being abandoned altogether. Flowers, and occasionally a small honbonnière are the only gifts now considered to be "in good form." The name eards are, therein good form." The name cards are, there-here, brought into greater prominence, and may be made to contribute to the artistic, consplimentary or amusing features of the occa-sion. On the reverse side a quotation appro-priate and flattering may be written.

Freshness, daintiness, absence of estenta-tion, while using all that one can command that is artistic and tasteful, should be the characteristics of a luncheon.

Without the slightest wish to deceive, all should go so smoothly that the general impression is left with your friends, despite their knowledge of entertainment, that you live every day as they find you when they are guests at your table. guesta at your table.

THE MENU OF A LUNCHEON

By FELICIA HOLT

UNCHEONS are considered by many to be expensive luxuries, and only within the reach of the few. This is not so. There is no reason why the mistress or the daughter of the house whose income is limited should not have luncheons, and pretty ones, too. A dainty luncheon for a few friends calls for but little trouble on outlay. By not at the first essay, have too outlay. Do not, at the first essay, have too many dishes. Five or six courses make a dainty and toothsome repast. In winter em-ploy oysters on the half shell, for which you pay twenty cents per dozen; serve five on a plate with a piece of cut, not sliced, lemon. Then serve a clear sonp, or purée of tomatoes, asparagus or peas—these latter being made as deliciously from canned as from fresh vegeta-bles. For the third course I would suggest chops, brolled or brended, and French pens; those in the glass jars are freshest, and one jar at forty-five cents will be sufficient for eight people, if served on the plate; with this mashed sociatoes, browned, or potato bouleties, should be passed. A salad should come next, either of lettuce or tomato, with mayonnaise or French dressing, the latter consisting simply of vinegar, olive oil, salt and pepper. Thin water crackers and a good cheese should be passed with the salad. If you wish to order an ice from a confectioner do so; if not, some sweets such as preserved ofners strawberries. an ice from a confectioner do so; if not, some sweets, such as preserved ginger, strawberries and cake, should come next, followed by small caps of royally strong coffee, with cream and sugar passed, and this will close your very pretty, and surely not extravagant, inncheon, If you desire an entrie, you can buy a pair of large sweetbreads, enough for eight per-sons, if served in china, silver or paper shells; parboil them, rick them to pieces, rejection

Then put in your sweetbrends and stir over the steam of the tea-kettle for about five minutes; add a half-spoonful of salt and a dash of white pepper. This will be delicious to the taste, and a considerable addition to your bill of fare.

AN OLD-FASHIONED TEA

BY FRANCES E. LANDGAN

UR grandmothers dearly loved their "tea parties," and out of compli-ment to the dearest of them all, a New York society girl recently sent out invitations to a "Lace Tea." The cards of invitation were white, with a design imitating Honiton lace across the top, and in addition to the invitation, which read: "Miss Amy Lee requests your company at an old-fashioned tea, in honor of her grand-mother, Mrs. De Lacey Baker, on Monday evening. September twenty-sixth, eighteen hundred and ninety-two," the word "Laces" was engraved in one corner of the card.

The result was that the guests came in old-was engraves in one corner of the card.

The result was that the guests came in old-fashioned costumes, with hair well powdered, carried old-fashioned reticules, wore tiny black patches upon their faces, and, of course, their choicest pieces of lace. Ten was served in the dining-room; a snowy damask table-cloth covered the table, at the head of which was placed a leave tile of the covered. placed a large silver tray upon which were arranged, in perfect symmetry, the dainty white and gold china teacupe and sancers. Upon either side was placed the quaint silver tea ser-vice of Queen Anne pattern, with its grace-fully-curved, fluted handles. Old-fashioned candelabra, with plain white wax candles, and candelabra, with plain white wax candles, and no new-fangled paper shades, stood upon lace masts on either side of a chinn bowl filled with crimson dalıllas. The guests were in number ten. At each place was laid a plate of white and guld, a large damask table napkin folded perfectly square, a knife and two-pronged fork, both with white ivory handles, and a heavy silver dessert spoon. At the foot of the table was a large white and gold platter filled with slices of cold chicken garnished with nasturthum leaves, and upon either side similar dishes, containing daintily-cut slices of ham and tongue. The bread was cut in thin slices and tongue. The bread was cut in thin slices and buttered, so that neither butter plates nor butter dishes were needed. At certain equal distances stood little white pots of preserved strawberries and gooseberries, a jar of orange marmalade, and a pretty flat china dish of honey in the comb. Tiny little dishes in which these dainties were to be served and silver spoons of dessert size stood near. Low baskets of silver covered with lace held golden sponge and rich, dark fruit cake, and upon two silver trays, covered with lare, stood little Dresden china cups filled with custard, upon which a generous supply of nutmeg had been grated. The tea was hot and fragrant. There was no ice-water, nor, indeed, ice visible anywhere, yet everything looked cool, attractive and beauti-ful, and the dainty grandmamma in her old-fishioned flowered silk gown and lace cap and kerchief, sitting in the seat of honor, looked not one whit less attractive than her sweet grand-daughter, similarly attired, who poured the tea.

A UNIQUE LITERARY LUNCHEON

BY M. M. MORLEY

YOUNG girl, noted for originality, sent out recently dainty luncheon cards in one corner of which was written in a neat hand: "You are requested to come wearing an ornament symbolical of some well-known book."

The result was delightful. One fair maiden came gowned in white and wear-ing a large black hat, which was ornamented in front with a large old-fashioned cameo pin. in front with a large old-fashioned cameo pin. The quaint ornament was set in a circle of pearls, and bore the full-length figure of a woman. This was almost immediately recognized as "The Woman in White." Another symbol, which was decidedly more clever, went a long time unguessed. This was two large initials, nickel-plated letters "S" and "B," which were mistaken at first for Mrs. Wister's pretty story "The Initials," but which were later found to be intended to symbolize "Nicholas Nickleby," A lottery ticket stood sponsor for "Great Expectations," and a simple "R" for George Eliot's "Middlemarch." But the guessing did not begin in cornect until the guests were sented at the table. There they found as place cards little white books with their names and the date traced in gold upon the cover. In the date traced in gold upon the cover, these dainty sonvenirs they wrote their con-ception, or interpretation, of each guest's symbol, and then passed them around the table, to have each guess rectified or confirmed on the opposite page, thus obtaining the nutographs of all present.

One young girl at the table appeared in a gown of misty gray with a soft white wing on either shoulder. She represented Cooper's "Wing and Wing." One of the cleverest devices was a little blank book attached to one young woman's belt, with "Le Journal de Talleyrand" engraved upon the cover; this for "The Diplomat's Diary." Another girl for "The Diplomat's Diary." Another girl were a calendar containing the names of the three months June, July and August. This was of course, intended to represent "One Summer." "The Gold Bug" was there in Summer." "The Gold Bug" was there in the form of an ancient Egyptian scarab, while "The Moonstone," "A Bow of Orange Ribbon," and "The Rose in Bloom," had each their representative. A flower bedecked Gainsborough shaded one fair face that smiled coquettishly "Under the Lilias," while "The Three Feathern" waved proudly over another. The last one to be guessed was that worn by a certain dainty maid who carried in the belt of her dull blue gown a bunch of Marguerites. Why should they have been slow to remember dear, foolish little "Daisy Miller?"

A TALK ABOUT TEAS

BY MRS. BURTON KINGSLAND

HE modern "tea" is the lineal, though degenerate, descendant of the "sulon" which, for years in England, and especially in France, played so conspicuous a part, and where woman first attained that social pre-eminence that has since been conceded as her special prerogative.

Up to the time of the famous Marquise de Up to the time of the famous Marquise de Rambouillet, there was no society apart from the court; but in her celebrated "salon bleu," it is said that "the social instinct was born," and the court were deserted by the more cultured for an intercourse more varied, polished and informal than had hitherto existed. The re-sult was a series of reunions so clumming and as resoulars as to have presed jute history, and so popular as to have possed into history; and, therefore, would it not be well for us to study their conditions of success, and endeavor to throw a little more life and interest into our

At these charming salons the same people met often; and this, I think, we may profitably follow. Give, if you must, one all-inany foliow. Give, if you most, one all-in-clusive reception to your acquaintances, but if you would enjoy your friends, have them "in numbers few," Either invite a few con-genial spirits once a week, or, still better, be-cause affording more variety, let a dozen friends agree to mret as often at each other's houses it turn.

THIS was tried last winter in New York by a party of friends with great success. Nothing more informal and delightful could be imagined; for in large cities real sociability is fast dying out, and if anything can revive some such plan may. The hostess in this instance received her guests in a pretty ten gown, a cheerful fire burned on the hearth, a few flowers added their fragrance, comfortable cluirs were drawn up in cozy nearness to each other, while the divans were made most alluring by a "riot of downy pillows." In one corner stood the dainty tea-table, with its steaming arm, egg-shell cups, bright silver and snowy napery. Every guest was welcomed with evident pleasure. Formality was entirely banished. As the bour selected was from five ished. As the hour selected was from over matil six, the husbands, brothers and in-timate gentlemen friends found it extremely agreeable to drop in on their way home for a chat and a cup of tea.

A NOTHER suggestion comes to us from the "salous:" There the literary stars of the day were wont to essay the quality of their light on a smaller audience before giving it to the world; and though we are not so ambitious, it may be tacitly understood that should we hear a good story, get some strong or helpful thought from our reading, or hear some neighbor labels in the best of the start of should we hear a good story, get some strong or helpful thought from our reading, or hear some piece of news, that we treasure it to be shared at our "tea party."

A little music is always welcomed at a "tea," and can be previously arranged for from among those invited. As to the edibles, there is generally a bit of pleasant emulation where there are several hostesses; and though nothing is "enrégle," at a "tea" but bread and better, a little cake, and the "cup that cheers," there is ample opportunity for the display of taste and individuality in the manner of their serving, and the variations may be endless, taking this simple fare for a "theme." The home-made bread, spread on the loaf and cut very thin, as in our grand-mother's day, the little inger-rolls lined with "pâté de foie gras," brown bread, rather thickly covered with some especially delicious butter, are all acceptable, while, of course, the cake may be infinitely varied.

The Russians always take their ten with slices of lemon, which seems to suit nearly every palate, and in very thin glasses in preference to cups. They contend too, that tea should be drunk immediately after its infusion, before the water has time to attack the stem of the leaf.

The little two-storied tea tables are most stem of the leaf.

The little two-storied tea tables are most convenient, and some are further supplemented with wings of the size of plates. It is preferable to keep all its belongings on the table itself, and not distribute them on all the adjacent farniture, as is often done. If possi-ble, have a little table here and there, or other convenience whereon a cup may be laid, while some small napkins give one a feeling of security against accidents

O NE of the features of Washington society last winter was a succession of "Literary Teas." Friends met torother. Teas." Friends met together at regular in-tervals, and each brought a newspaper clip-ping, poem, or short story, which she read for the general entertainment. Sometimes it was merely an anecdote, but each selection was merely an anecdote, but each selection was either witty, sparkling, amusing, or imparted information in an enjoyable manner. Another party of friends of more serious tastes chose an historical period to be studied, At their meetings one lady read a paper on the fashions of that day, about which she had fully informed herself. Another wrate of the fully informed herself. Another wrote of the prominent men; a third of the forms of enter-tainment and recreation then popular, while others gave the results of their investigations about the state of art, the religious movements of the time, and even the "fads" then prevalent. At the end of the season all the materials so contributed were collected and printed for distribution among the members of the "Tea Party," who were pleased and surprised to find it so complete a history of the period. To make such reunions successful the rules to be observed are few and simple.

Let everything pertaining to the refreshments be dainty, the room coxy and cheerful, the guests well selected, the welcome hearty; and the hostess will assuredly feel, on the departure of her friends, the truth of the old adage that "the pleasure of giving pleasure is the greatest pleasure!"

CHAPTER VI

HN TALBOT in the days that followed un-dertook a serious task of self-discipline. It became certain to him now that the kiss which Kate had given him once had expressed nothing but the child-OHN nothing but the child-ish affection which, somehow, he had managed to forfeit. Not that somehow, he had managed to forfeit. Not that he regretted it, but it was what he would now scorn. He wanted her love, and what was he to ask it? In the light of that question he felt, for the first time, a keen self-abusement no circumstances of his life had ever caused in him before. If the way had been clear, the path distinct and straight for him to try to win her, he felt sure she could never love him. One of the confused feelings that rose within him as he stood by and listened to the him. One of the confused feelings that rose within him as he stood by and listened to the men that praised her, while he opened not his lips, was a wish to make himself worthy; but a virtue that is its own and only reward is a meaningless thing to a man who feels as John Talbot felt then. The love that had come into being so suddenly, and which yet had obstinately refused to be demed or called by any smaller name, through or called by any smaller name, through all the months in which it had lived on with such frugal cheer to feed upon, had, in these few weeks of daily, though distant, intercourse with its dear object, so broadened and deepened dear object, so broadened and deepened and strengthened that, although his somewhat tired and saddened hearthad seemed suddenly to have expanded its capacity almost to immensity, it was filled full land to bursting. There was no room in it for any other feeling. Work, ambition, dreams of greatness, all were crowded out. All his theories began to swerve and change. Suppose he was poor, should that hold him back when love, the supreme riches, was his to offer in such large abundance? Suppose he was twelve years older, and Kate very ignorant of the world and the men who lived in it? Did it not mean twelve years more of longing loneliness which he had honorably tried to keep good and pure for the woman he should have a root worked. which he had honorably tried to keep good and pure for the woman he should love some day, and whose emptiness she now might fill? And as for her henorance of the men of her world, was she not infinitely better spared that knowledge? Who of them all was so qualified to make her happy as the one who could love her most? And no one could love her as he did. Yes; it was quite true that the hindrances which had once seemed to restrain him were hald even with the ground now by the great leveler, love. But love must be met by love, and there it was that he came face to face with his despair. It was as plain to him as day-light that Kate Carew not only did not love him, but he could not even imagine that the eyes which had looked at him with love.

in them last could ever come to look at him with love.

So Kate had triumphed even beyond her knowledge. She had felt that he wished to test her by a repetition of that music, and she knew she had come through the test victoriously. Her woman's pride was satisfied completely; she felt she had settled, once for all, the point that it had galled her so to feel there could be any doubt about in Talbot's mind. She knew, as well as he, the message he had received in that cold glance. It was all exactly as she would have had it, and yet, for all that, her pillow that night was drenched with tears, and not until sleep felt upon her did her sobbing cease.

Vete had ext into the habit of gains.

Kate had got into the habit of going familiarly and frequently to Mrs. Gwyn's rooms to talk with the little mother, and to play with the babies, and had found, in this intercourse, one of the greatest pleasures of her daily life. It was a charming bit of domesticity, so ut-terly unlike the atmosphere surrounding it that she got from it many a fresh bright breath, that gave her a much-needed strength for the endurance of those brilliant days and nights which many a young girl envied her. She knew this, and it made her smile drearily. true that men admired her, wanted to marry her, offered her love and devotion and position and fortune; but to every one of them her heart would shut up close, and she had made up her mind that, for her at least, love made up her mind that, was a thing that could come but once, and each day marriage seemed to her more disthatly impossible. Life looked very blank alsead of her, and she tried to shun her own thoughts, one means to this end being these little visits which she made to Mrs. Gwyn's bedroom or nursery; they had come to con-stinute the plenometest part of her day.

She knocked one morning at the nursery door, and being told to enter came in to find a bright wood fire burning on the hearth, it being one of these raw and chilly summer days which are so trying at the seashore. young mother, in a soft dressing goun, was scated before the fire, with one buby on her lup, toasting its little pink-soled feet at the blaze, and the other on the rug at her feet, tugging away at his socks in order to put himself in the same advantageous case came forward, in response to a smile of welcome from Mrs. Gwyn, and audible but incoherent ejaculations of pleasure from the babies, "O, how sweet and cozy!" she said, taking another rocking-chair; and seizing the other baby she laid him on her lap and began to tousle and tickle and kiss him, until he laughed half breathlessly.

"I believe I would like to kiss you to death," she said, reluctantly giving him a breathing space. "When I begu on that soft little place right under your chin I can't bear to stop. Oh, how sweet you are! I wish your mudder'd give you to me! She usight, if she wasn't so greedy. Couldn't you be induced to divide?" she said, looking hughingly across at Mrs. Gwyn, and pulling off her charge's socks, and turning his toes to the fire, as the mother was holding his brother's.

"If any one alive could tempt me to such a

"If any one alive could tempt me to such a thing 1 do believe it would be you," said Mrs. Gwyn. "I never, in all my life, saw such a mother girl as you are. Just think of the joy the little creatures give! For my part, I married a poor man who hasn't got very much richer since the nuptials, and having but one nurse for two babies I have to do a good deal of the nursing myself. But, do you believe, I "Ought, but doesn't. My dear, it's no use "Ought, but doesn't. My dear, it's no use talking to these worldly people about love in poverty: they don't believe in it."

"I believe in it," said Kate.

"Just because you're so unworldly; that's exactly it."

"Am I unworldly? I'm so glad you tell me that," said the girl, looking at her wistfully.

"It's a very plain and certain fact, my dear," said Mrs. Gwyn. "I don't think I ever knew a more unworldly heart. I wrote Tom list night that, so far as I could judge by appearances, you had refused several of the best catches here, but certainly not for being ambitious; for I felt sure you would not hesitate a moment to marry a man who hadn't a penny if you loved him. Now, would you?

"Is that a great proof of unworldliness?" said Kate. "It seems one of the simplest things on earth to me. But look at this little monkey! If he isn't going to sleep! I seem to exercise a soporific influence over them."

"It is their sleepy time, and they are as recooler as two little chacks." This can will be

Let me make him nice and comfy, and put him to sleep in my arms —the darling! just look how contented he is!" and shedrew his little head up against her breast, and sat rocking him gently to and fro until be was really fast asleep. Even then she would not lay him down, but begged that she might be allowed to hold him.

"You've make a complete convert of John."

"You've made a complete convert of John," said Mrs. Gwyn. "He turns up in here my time, and I find him playing with the babies.

"She was safe in the isolation of that lonely road" wouldn't do it, anyway? Isn't be, dear?" she ended, bending over to kiss the laby in Knte's lap, and then kissing the top of the little brown lend that rested against ber own breast, "Give him up, indeed!" she said. "It would be just as impossible to part with one as with both."

"How happy you do seem!" and Note in the little brown in the little brown.

"How happy you do seem!" said Kate. "I think you're the happiest person I ever saw." "That's because you haven't seen my hus-band, dear," said Mrs. Gwyn; "you'd find him just as happy. Wait till he comes to take me home, and see if you don't say so?"
"And what makes you both so happy?"

Mind! I should think not! As for Tom, he simply chuckles over it. My dear, we know people pity us, and call us pampers, and say we were fools to marry, but it silds to the gest of the thing. Tom makes enough to keep us very comfortable, and has prospects of doing better, and we're just as jolly as sandboys, and ask for nothing more. To auntie's cyes, however, we are objects of deep sympa-thy. I understand it perfectly, from her point thy. I understand of view, don't you?'

said Kate, "I suppose I do; and yet the tremendous lack of happiness among people who have all the conditions of it, according to their code, ought to show the fool-islaness of such ideas."

He never would take the least notice of them before.

"It was only necessary for him to stop and ok," said Kate." "I am only responsible

"What was it about his refusing to take that money?" said Kate, bending her cheek down against the sleeping baby's head. "I never quite understood about it, though I've

A great many people blamed John very much. Anntie, as you may imagine, was in a perfect rage, but little he cared. Tom and I told him he did exactly right, but he seemed to care for our support as little as he cared for the disapproval of others. He acted on his own responsibility, and there was an end of it. He's fond of telling about Agassiz—I think it was—who said he never continued any line of work beyond the point where it became money making, as he knew there were plenty of people who would take it up there, and he turned his attention then to something that might be left undone unless he did it. That's something of John's spirit, too, though I don't think he'd despise the money if it came. Dear John! He leads a very honely life," she added, sighing. "I wish he had a home and a sweet wife. I don't think he suspects it, but he is naturally one of the most domestic of men."

At this moment there was a tap at

At this noment there was a tap at the door, and then, without waiting for permission, some one turned the knob and entered. Both Indies looked round—the object of their conversation was before them. He looked surprised, and made a mortan as if the ratio last was before them. He looked surprised, and made a motion as if to retire, but Mrs. Gwyn insisted he should stay. He seemed to hesitate, but then came forward and sat down in the chair his sister pointed to. The room was very still, and Kate was glad to draw back, out of the light from the fire. She could see a strange look in John Talbot's eyes as he glanced quickly at her, and then put out one of his hands, whose every line and contour she could see with her eyes closed, and gently closed his lingers round the buby's foot that rested on her knee. Kate was thankful to the merelful shadows that hid her face, for weak tears had risen to her eyes for weak tears had risen to her eyes and were stealing down her cheeks. Through them she could see John Talbot's hand move softly up and down the little chubby foot and ankle, with a soft caressing touch that seemed to penetrate to her very beaut. A order down the little chubby foot and ankle, with a soft caressing touch that seemed to penetrate to her very heart. A rather awkward silence fell upon the group around the fire. Now and then Mr. Talbot, or his sister, said something in a whispered tone, and then they got quiet again. Mrs. Gwyn rocked her haby gently, and John Talbot's hand caressed the little foot, but Kate was both silent and still. The thoughts of all three were rapid and intense, but the mind of each was veiled from the other. Kate thought his mood was passive, while her heart was almost bursting. He thought she did not speak because her thoughts were elsewhere. As for little Mrs. Gwyn, she absolutely knew that some singular misuaslerstanding existed between these two, but she felt herself helpless to remove it. Presently there was a knock at the door, and a servant came in with a letter. Talbot got up at once, and making some excuse went off to his room. and making some excuse went off to

"He does look badly," said Mrs.
Gwyn, almost auxiously. "Don't you

And Kate, in all sincerity, admitted that CHAPTER VII

T was the day after this, at dinner, that Mrs. Owen mentioned the fact that Talbot was going to leave them the next morning. She was full of regrets, which everyone knew to be sincere, for whether in her city home or here one of her strongest efforts was to get John Talbot to come to her house as much as possible. No one else advised her so all matters of importance to her, little or big, and no one's else services were so efficient or so acceptable. Hers was not the only voice, by any means, that protested against Mr. Talbot's departure, and this defection from the pleasant party, but Kate Carew suld nothing. Her silence was not noticed by anyone except Talbot himself, and as knowledge of it smote him with regn pain, how little did be dream of the tumuly with which the heart that beat beneath that calm exterior was fluttering. play, while they sat in the moonlight and listened. The request was engerly seconded by several voices, and Mr. Talbot was asked if he would accompany her. He promptly expressed his willingness, but waited to see what Kate would do. Almost to his surprise she got up, crossed the moonlighted porch and went into the drawing-room. As she took her violin out of its case Talbot began to hum and she caught the strains of "Good-bye, Summer," Tosti's exquisite music to those exquisite words.

"Do you want to play that?" she said, while play, while they sat in the moonlight and "I wish you could sing it," he said. "The words are such a big part of its beauty."

"I always say them to myself as I play," she

Do you? So do I," he said. "I thought

"Do you? So do 1, he said, "I thought that was a trick of my own."

He struck those splendid opening chords, and she began. The sweet, appealing words were uttered literally by heart by each of them, and seemed the more especially their own because those listeners outside heard the music only.

"All the to-morrows shall be as to-day," the heart of each was saying as the aweet notes thrilled the air. And again:

What are we waiting for, oh my beart? Kiss me straight on the brows, and part. What are we waiting for, you and 1? A piceding look and a stifled sigh! Good-bye, forever, good-bye, good-bye."

The violin wailed them forth, those hopeless words, with a passionate pathos no human voice could have surpassed. He seemed, indeed, to bear them plainly uttered, as the in-domitable message of fate to him-and so, also, did Kate hear them. Her eyes were full of tears, her hands were shaking, but she managed to get through to the end, and when the last note had died away and a stupid clapping had been set up by the audience outside, she felt, rather than saw, that John Talbot had risen and turned toward her. She put down risen and turned toward her. She put down her violin and how abruptly, and slipped out on the porch. The company clamored for more music, but she was obdurate. She was not in the vein, she said, and that must suffice. John Talbot had slipped away somewhere, and she did not see him again that evening. Next morning he said a formal good-bye in the presence of a dozen people, and he was gone. Summer was over, indeed, the summer of love and life, and she felt in her heart she had told it good-bye forever.

The party at Mrs. Owen's autickly dishanded

The party at Mrs. Owen's quickly disbanded after this, and the time came round for the family themselves to go away. They were pledged to make some visits before taking up winter quarters in their city home, and though some of these invitations included Kate, and she had various others in addition to them, she persuaded her aunt to let her have her way and spend this interval with her grand-

"I've really no right to say anything against it," said Mrs. Owen, "as there is no good reason to give. But what in the world you can see in that dull place to make you so eager to return to it I cannot imagine. I thought, after your delightful season here, you'd be spoiled for such a state of stagnation. But I declare, you seem to care nothing whatever for all the success you have had. You're an ord girl, Kate! I begin to believe I shall never understand you." never understand you.

She made no effort, however, to interfere with her purpose, and a week later Kate and Maria were back in Virginia.

CHAPTER VIII

BACK in Virginia! Back in the old famil-D jar spot from which she had lately gone forth, thinking that her fight was over-her victory won. Alas, it seemed now that it had only just begun—that long struggle! It was only just begun—that long struggle! It was all to do over again, and the battle was far fiercer and hotter than before. The odds against her infinitely greater! She was no longer capable of making the efforts she had managed to make then—of thinking of others, and trying, in that way, to get comfort for her own keen pain. All her pity was for herself now. She could look nowhere but into the dark doubts of her own termented social. dark depths of her own tormented spirit. It seemed to her so sad and piteous a case had never been before, and she could not see the justice of it. What had she ever done to be made to suffer like this? It was punishment enough for a long life of willful transgression, and she had tried to be good; she had loved God, and made it her effort to lead a true life and please Him. Well, the time of effort of sort seemed to be passed with her now. Size did not even try not to be unhappy, but gave berself up to it, and let the waves of wretchedness, which her thoughts of both the past and future brought her, sweep over her in billows beneath which she lay in hopeless

She did not try to concent from Maria the fact that she was unhappy, and her maid's sympathy was the more grateful for its un-questioningness. Comprehension was a thing she still had strength to deny herself, though even to have put her hend down in Maria's lap and poured out all her grief would have en an exquisite solace to her. But her own heart, and that alone, must know its bitter-

How desniate the days were, and how end-se, though she rose from bed very late and retired early, wooing the unconsciousness of sleep with an eagerness that often defeated its own end. Sometimes she would walk the floor for hours, when all around her sleps, and then again, after some of those days of racking thought and torturing memory, she would fall into a slumber as profound as if she had been drugged, and not wake until far into the following day. But that waking, when it came, was terrible, and the long oblivion she lad gained was dearly paid for. Often she had un-happy dreams, and waked to find reality unhappier still; but sometimes her dreams were happier still; but sometimes ner ureans were full of joy, and then the waking was still more wretched. She no longer made the careful toilets once so habitual to her, but after her morning bath was over, her long hair brushed and coiled, almost without a glance at the mirror, comfort and neatness being her only motives now, she would put on one of her motives now, she would put on one of her pretty, loose dressing-gowns, which left her body, at least, untrammeled, and would sit half through the day, thinking, thinking, thinking the thoughts that wrung her heart and scorched her brain. Nothing seemed worth making any effort for. The letters of her friends she did not answer, though she read them engerly, scanning the pages with a breathless interest in scarch of the one name that had meaning for her. Sometimes he was mentioned incidentally as being at this or that place, reading a paper before some society, writing an article that was talked about, plainly going his usual ways, seeking his pleasures and interests in the common course, while she, without a pleasure or an interest left, was enduring life in lonely wrechedness far off and forgotten. She never left the house, though the weather was like the climate of paradise, and, stretched out all around her, were the still waters and green pastures she had one loved to see. Now it only increased were the still waters and green pastures she had once loved to see. Now it only increased her wretchedness to know that skies were blue, and fields were green, and flowers bloomed, and birds were singing. She shanned all of these sights and sounds.

One afternoon—the first time since her re-turn—she got out her violin and began to play. All day she had felt hard, and bitter, and rebellious, but as she played her mood changed, and the tears began to gather in her eyes. Thicker and faster they came as those walls of sweat mellow rose from the instruwails of sweet melody rose from the instru-ment, which was soon wet with those bitter waters. Her breast heaved, and half-smothered little sobs escaped her, but she still played on, the intense, keen sweetness vibrating through her and augmenting the deep feeling of her heart, which, in turn, expressed itself in finer, and fuller, and more thrilling melody than that little violin had ever uttered before. As she played that plaintive tune she was saying to herself, over and over those plaintive to herself, over and over, those plaintive

She put the violin from her and threw her-She put the violin from her and threw her-self on the lounge, shaking from head to feet with great, stifling, suffocating sols. She knew it was absolutely so, that she had said good-bye forever to her dreams of happiness, and what, out of all that mighty renunciation, was there left her to remember? The exitasy of one moment's bits, which she had freely and absolutely given herself up to. Some-times she had bitterly repented that, but in this moment she was wholly glad of it. There had been times when it had comforted her to remember that all the time she had held her remember that all the time she had held her bow in one hand and her violin in the other and had given him only her lips; but now she wished, from her soul she wished, that, to make the memory of that supreme moment sweeter, she had cast these recklessly away, no matter where, to clasp close for that once the head that never again, in all the coming years, could rest against the heart that worshiped him. She wished she had! She wished she had! The time might come again when she would be glad to have escaped that self-abasement, but now she hungered-for the mere memory of it.

Presently the knob turned softly and Maria came into the room. Kate tried to dry her eyes, but meeting the look of dumb sympathy turned upon her, it started her tears afresh turned upon her, it started her tears afresh and she cried out piteously:

"O Maria, I'm so unhappy. Come and stay with me. Sit in that big chair, and take me in your lap and hold me, won't you? just as if I were some little child you had to take care of I've nobody in all the world to take care of me—nobody. O, aren't you sorry for me? I know you are. In't it awful to suffer like this and want what you can never, never, never get?" never get?

" Law, Miss Kate," said the good creature, "Law, Miss Kate," said the good creature, soothingly, as she rocked to and fro with her lovely burden clasped in her arms, like a child, "Seemlike you oughtn' be unhappy. What mek you want'n' somethin' you can' get? Seemlike you is got ev'ything."

"O Maria, no I haven't! There's one thing I haven't got that I'd give all the rest, a million times over, to have," said Kate, drawing together her shoulders, like a child, indeed, and are said to the page price, kind and pressing closer to the negro girl's kind breast, half shivering as if she felt cold, "O Maria, I want it so, I want it so. I've prayed to God to give it to me 'till He must be tired of hearing me. Maria, what must I do to make Him give it to me? I'd be so good and thankful to Him all my life, and I'd never complain of anything else He sent me if He ust would let me have this one dear thing, 0, vou believe he hears me, don't you? know He does, though I feel so far away from Him, and I can't pray, except to say His name, and the name of thrist, over and over again, to show them that I have not quite let go my clinging to them, though I seem a mil-Bou miles away. I do still believe a little that God loves me, but I can't believe it as much as I used to do. O Maria, you pray for me. Ask Him to give me the thing I want, me. Ask Him to give me the thing I want, and tell Him how patiently I'll bear every other trouble He sends me."

"He ain' gwine lissen to no sich talk ex that," and Maria, still classing close the tall figure on her lap, but speaking with a strong conviction. "Effith' Ole Marster 'lowed us to converton. "Ell in Ole Marster lowed as to choose our own crosses, things'd come to a pretty pass. Nobody don' never like their own pertickler cross. Conse de don't! But de got ter tek it, I tell you en I reckon you not to tek your's too, my po' little chile. I wish I could tell you diff rent, but dat's de way I see it, on I'm boun' to tell de trufe."

-"O, Maria, I know all that," said Kate, half petulantly. "You don't comfort me a bit. God must mean it when He tells us He will answer our prayers, and ob, I beg, and be-seech, and implore Him to give me this. You can't think He will call Himself Our Father, and promise all He has, and then not hear me when I cry to Him like this, as I've cried for months and weeks, day and night, until I am just worn out."

"Coase I don't think it. He done beard every call, en He gwine answer, too, but His way ain' yo' way." Kate got to her feet and turned away.

"Nothing helps me," she said, desperately,
"You try to give me comfort, but you only make me worse. I don't want something else.
I don't want what is for my good. I want just one thing, and only one, and if that can never come to me, I'd rather never have been born. O, I wish I was dead and buried, lying this minute in a deep, still grave, with the grass growing over me."

Tears rose to her eyes again, tears of intense self-pity. It made her pity herself the more to think that there was no one else to pity

Presently she turned with a sudden change of tone and said she would go out and take a walk, telling Maria to get her dress and hat.

"You gwine tek me wid you?" asked the humble creature very timidly. She loved her young mistress tenderly, and it grieved her to see that her efforts at comfort had apparently done more larm than good. Kate and sometimes taken her with her formerly on her long country walks, as a sort of protector, and she hoped she would be taken now.

"No, Maria," she said, "I'm going by my-f. I feel hard and bad this evening, and I'd only hart your feelings if I tried to talk to you. Don't mind me. I'll take you with me

She forced herself to speak kindly, but her tone and expression both showed that she did, indeed, feel hard, and as she walked along quickly over the quiet country lanes, lying still and peaceful under the purple baxe of autumn, she felt this hardness deepening within her. Why shouldn't she be hard? Did not hardness indomitable wrap her in on every side? Had not the door of happiness every side? Had not the door of happiness been shut fast in her face in pittless, unalter-able hardness? The longing for admission through that close-shut door was upon her this afternoon like an encompassing atmos-phere. She walked faster and faster and faster, her heaving breast and panting body according with the tumult within her. A mighty thirst was on her that she felt that nothing could satisfy but the great draughts she craved from the exhaustless fountain of laye. It was love she wanted! love love laye. love. It was love she wanted! love, love, love! It was for that she begged, and prayed, and ngonized, and feeling that she was denied it, nothing but hardness remained. "That you, Miss Kate? How you been all this long time? I mighty glad to see you back

Kate stopped abruptly, startled out of her dark mood at finding herself so familiarly ad-dressed. She was passing a little settlement of negro dwellings not far beyond the house, and looking over the dilapidated fence that surrounded one of these she recognized a woman who had been accustomed to do her washing during her former stay. She remembered that on her return her grandmother had told her she had engaged someone else in her place, Aunt Milly being incapacitated by an injury to her hand. In her self-absorption she had scarcely given the matter a passing thought, but now, seeing that the woman carried one arm in a sling, she stopped and inquired how her hand was. Looking over the pulings she saw that Aunt Milly was bending over a wash-tub, laboriously rubbing some pieces of cloth-ing against a motal washkard with hor ing against a metal washboard with her uninjured hand. At the sight a healthful little shoot of human compassion sprung up in Kate's beart.

"Thank'ee, ma'am. It's gittin' 'long right smart, my hand is," said Aunt Milly, cheer-fully, "though it pains me still a good deal, of nights. But Lor', not like it used to! Why, there was weeks that it run me all but plumb craxy, en I walked the floor with it night and day. It's a beap better now, though, thank'ee ma'am. I was jess rubbin' out a few pieces for mother on the washboard. I kin git along right good with the help of a corn-cob dipped in soft soap. You see, it's sech a blessed thing it warn't my right hand that got hurt. 'Pears like if it had been that, I'd a had to give up. sure. Come in a minute, won't you, Miss Kate? I'd like to give you some o' my sun-flowers. It's a pertickler kind, maybe you aint seen."

Kate accepted the invitation under the impulse of a strong feeling of compunction that was rising within her. No doubt this woman had felt the need of the money her washing would have afforded her, and she began to feel a sharp sting of self-reproach, and to think how she could make amends.

As Aunt Milly came forward, wiping her hand on her apron and opened the dilapidated little gate for her, Kate saw how changed she Her face was thin and pinched and bore the marks of great suffering, and also, as Kate feared to think, of want and hunger as well.

"I hated powerful to give up your clothes, Miss Kate," said Aunt Milly, smiling a gra-cious welcome. "My hand was so much better, I thought maybe I could make out to do 'em in a little while agin, but I know you're mighty pertickler and I dare's n to ven-

The word sounded in her ears like a crime.

"You'll have to come through the house, please Miss." said Aunt Milly, "the sundlowers grow at the back, an' I'll be mighty proud to give you some. Mother's rect po'ly to-day," she went on cheerfully, as Kate followed her just the squallil room, which, except for the loft, which was approached by a rickety lashfer, was the only one the house contained. contained.

In a wretched bed in one corner, propped up with pillows, which though certainly not snowy, showed yet an effort at cleanliness, which, under the circumstances, seemed al-most sublime. Kate saw a bollow-eyed, emariated old begress, who was struggling and panting so for breath that, to her inexperi-ence, she seemed in the very agony of death. The perspiration stood out in hirle bends on her forchead, and ran in little wet lines down her forchead, and ran in little wet lines down the sides of her face, until it was absorbed in the collar of her coarse night-gown. Her bony hands were clutching at a ragged old paim-leaf fan, and her hard breathing sounded as if each effort would be the last. "It's the as'my," explained Annt Milly, civilly, as she wiped a chair for Kate to sit upon. "She's got it reel bad to-day. Want some water, mother?" she asked, cheerfully, reaching for a crucked mug that stood on a rickety bench by the bed.

The poor old creature shook her head, and even made an effort to bow and speak to Kate, as Aunt Milly, with evident pride, intro-duced her as "Miss Kate Crew," but the ex-ertion seemed to make her worse and Kate said at once:

"O, don't make her try to talk. Do let me do something for her! I'd give anything if you would! Isn't there anything that relieves her? Come outside and tell me."

"Yes'm! there's a sort of stuff the doctor gives her that seemlike it does her a power o' good, when I kin afford to git it," said Aunt Milly, "but somehow lately, money's been so SCHECO-

"O, don't say that!" cried Kate, reproach-fully. "Why haven't you come to me? You shall never be without it again. O, I would have helped you in all this trouble if you had only let me know."

She felt in her pocket and fortunately found her nurse there and with twent."

her purse there, and, with trembling, eager hands, poured all the loose change it contained —a few dollars—into Aunt Milly's palm, tell-ing her to get her mother whatever she needed, and to come for more the moment that was gone.

"I will come and see for myself every day," she said, "O, please don't thank me. I have so much more than my share of money, and health, and comfort, that all I want in the world is to do a little for others.

She was so near breaking down altogether that, escaping from the grateful creature's ardeat thanks, she turned rapidly away and voice, and then, as soon as she had escaped again and was alone in the culm stillness of the autumn fields, her tears began to full, the her lips upon them.

"Forgive, forgive!" she cried, liftregive, lorgive, largive: she creat, integring her tear-dimined eyes to heaven and whispering the words to the listening car that she felt to be beyond those clouds. "My God, I take it. I accept my suffering. It is the common lot. I will never murmur at it any more, but take it from Thy loving hand and more, but take it from Thy loving hand and press its thorns into my wounded heart. I do not ask to be exempt. I do not want the ease and comfort and joy when there is pain and suffering and want like this around me. Dear Father, look what it is I offer—what I willingly hold out to Thee and consent to give up forever. All the happiness I have drenned of, all the bliss I have thirsted for. Take it, most neighty God. I let it go, freely, and will henceforth walk the thorny path Thy Son hath walked before me. Only let me be a help to others—give a little rest to the weavy feet and hold up the tired hands. It is the only wish that I have left—to comfort them along this dreary path, these sorrowing ones, my sisters dreary path, these sorrowing ones, my sisters and my brothers.

Unconscious of berself, but safe in the isolation of that lonely road, she lifted up her actual hands toward the skies, as if she held actual hands toward the skies, as if she held therein the gift she proffered, the happiness of her whole life, as a free-will offering, a willing surrender. The tears were wet still on her face, and above them her eyes glowed darkly with the sublime self-abnegation of her soul. Her face was glorified as with a radiant joy, and seeing her now one would have said her heart's desire had been given her. It was in-deed a moment of rantage. A sense of suiritdeed a moment of raptore. A sense of spirit-ual ecstasy arose within her and lifted her into a high current that she had never breathed before. The thought of the happi-ness she had renounced gave her no sorrow now. Personal gratification could find no place nor portion in her, for the rapture of self-immolation possessed her wholly, So one more stage of Kate's life journey was passed-a sad and bitter one; but out of its pains and trials had come into her an assurance of strength to tread the path to co with firm feet and a resolute, availing will,

*III.-MARGARET DELAND

BY MARGUERITE MERINGTON

RS. MARGARET DELAND s descended from an old Scotch family named Camp-bell. Pittsburgh is her birthplace, and there among the sweetest recollections of her childhood

"the garden glows,
And 'gainst its waits the city's heart still beats,
And out from it each summer wind that blows Carries some sweetness to the tired streets."

After her school days at Pelham Priory, Mrs. Deland studied art at Cooper Institute, in New York. Since her marriage she has lived in Boston, where the quickening influences of the city have stimulated her to devote to litera-ture the keen observation, original thought and lively fancy that have always marked her conversation and made her a delightful correspondent,

Mrs. Deland is one of those people who have on their surroundings. Her city home is as artistic and free from the conventional as her writings. Outside, the house differs little from its red brick neighbors of the city street; with-in it has individual character and charm, the standard the conventions of the city street. Quaint windows that the architect never planned have been added to the walls, and let n floods of subshine from unexpected nooks. The flowers, arranged in delicate, old-fashioned bowls, that perfume the pages of "John Ward," have evidently been copied from life, To-day a hoge log five is blazing on the hearth of the sitting room, realizing the defiance graven above it on the high brick mantel-piece:

Blow, blow ye winds of whirling mow : Ye cannot quench my ruddy glow,"

The hangings of the windows are of soft, dult yellow silk, and so are the panelings of the organ that stands between the windows. The organ itself is white, like the woodwork of the room. On it is an open book of columnies, for Mrs. Delaud, though not a musician, has a love for sorred music. Above it langes a copy of the Sistine Madonna. Pictures are plentiful; books are everywhere. In the empressions of the deep windows white and vellow plentiful; books are everywhere. In the em-brastics of the deep whithows white and yellow. Chinese lilies, with long, sword-like leaves of vivid green, are in blossom and fill the room with fragrance. In the room up-stairs the log-fire is repeated and seated by it, at her desk, with her great English mostiff, "Eric," sleep-ing beside her, sits Mrs. Deland at work. Earnest and painstaking as a workman is she, following the rule that Dr. Johnson told Sir Joshua Reynolds he had laid down for himself. "to make each work the best"

himself. "to make each work the best."
Headless of the munificent offers that are continually made to her to "pad out" short stories, or write "anything, on any subject." Mrs. Deland is true to her ideals, giving only her best thought in its worthiest form. "John Ward" underwent three successive, careful writings from rough notes before being typewritten for the printer. Three, sometimes four, galley-proofs of her MSS, are submitted in necession to the author before they arrive at the chrisalid stage of a page-proof reading. An hour before the "Tentonic" steamed down New York Bay in May, 1891, bearing Mrs. Deland for a summer holiday, she was giving careful correction to the proof of the chapters careful correction to the proof of the chapters of "Sidney," which were to appear in the August number of the "Atlantic Monthly," and the serial "Sidney" was most critically revised before its publication in book form. The wood sketches in "Florida Days" are not reminiscences worked up in the studio; they are aquarelles from nature, full of color and atmosphere. If for the releatless purposes of fiction a hero has to be sacrificed the family ductor is called in, and though not permitted to prescribe for the recovery of the patient, he makes as careful a diagnosis of the case as if makes as careful a diagnosis of the case as if beloved flesh and blood were in danger. John Ward's gloomy Calvinism was studied from the teachings and preachings of recognized authorities of the Presbyterian creed. Fic-tion, of course, steps in where husband and wife are parted, but the catastrophe is as in-evitable as the destruction of Ædipus, being a lossical conclusion of a rigid adherence to the logical conclusion of a rigid adherence to the letter of the belief.

In Education is often asked, to what faith does Mrs. Deland belong? People who insist upon imputing to authors the views of the puppets of their imaginings have assumed her to be a Calvinist with John Ward, a pantheist with Sidney, an agnostic with Helen Ward, a rational or irrational egotist with Major Lee. In England it was asked of her, "What new religious had she founded in America?" new religion had she founded in America?"
Far be it from me to define another person's "doxy," but I know that Mrs. Deland looks to Henren for light, to eternity for a solution of Heaven for light, to dernity for a solution of the vexed problems of life; finds in the liturgy of the Episcopal Church the best expression of worship; recognizes in Christ the "Counselor and King of Peace;" believes in prayer as the appeal of the soul seeking for truth to the "One who knows;" is a regular attendant at Trinity Church, where the great-souled teach-ings of the Rev. Phillips Brooks give comfort and strength to many who do profess and call themselves Christians, but whose theology de-fies a closer classification. fies a closer classification.

More interesting even than her rooms in the

More interesting even than her rooms in the city is the workshop that Mrs. Deland has contrived for herself in the summer home at Kennebunkport. I wonder if my readers know how beautiful a place the hayloft of a barn may be! Climbing the ladder we find that the huy has been pushed aside to make a corner for the desk and some favorite books. An open shutter gives a view of a silver creek, fringed with birches and rustling poplars. The wider shutter in front is open, too, and one may look down upon beds of insturtinins and sweet-peas, or beyond the garden across the road to the river. While we look one of the Kennebunk Indians, who still haunt the place, is sending his canoe up the river, standthe Kennebunk Indians, who still haunt the place, is sending his cance up the river, stand-ing, a dark figure at the prow, and paddling with quick, noiseless strokes. Between the flat, grass-grown bank on this side and the line of dark pine woods beyond, the river hastens to meet the sea, which lies in the dis-tance like a supphire on the bosom of the land. The marmur of the water comes to us on the fresh, salt breeze, and now and then an aro-matic breath from the pine woods. Lying there on the sweet-smelling stacks of hay, in there on the sweet-smelling stacks of hay, in drowsy content with the summer season, one may well say with John Ridd, "The mooing of a calf was music, and the chuckle of a fowl was wit, and the snore of the horse was news to me.

Now, dear maidens, if such there be who think that a gift for poesy implies a neglect of the practical duties of life, learn that much of Mrs. Deland's time is passed as if, like her own rosemary, it were

" Her one employ To fill some small, sweet needs."

As readily as she can join two lovers in a remance can she indissolubly unite butter and eggs into an omelette, and always for better, itever for worse. A mayonmaise from her skillful hand is as well-seasoned as an arguskillful hand is as well-seasoned as an argument against the doctrine of eternal punishment. Experiment has proven that from cream she can churn golden butter, sweet as cowslips, as truly as she can shape liquid fancies into compact verse. Her table, whether the need of the moment warrant simplicity or ceremony, is a dainty thing to behold, and her bospitality is simple and gracious as your favorite song from the "Old Garden." In the sick room she is an admirable nurse, quick of eye and light of touch, with the bright face and pleasant voice that come like sanshine to the heart of a sufferer.

Her friendships are few, but enduring.
Miss Elizabeth Whittock, the "E.W. W." of some of the poems, the valued and helpful friend of many years, stands nearest still, perhaps, as in their school days. Mrs. Deland's friendship for Miss Lucy Derby, of Boston, whose enthusiastic approbation decided her to undertake literary work, called forth the graceful dedication to the "Old Garden:

"Bweet, every thyme here with Sweet, every shyme here wilt Is yours, not mine; Your beart did dictate it, Mine wrote the line."

That the best part of her life is her home-life may be truly inferred from Mrs. Deland's stories, for the door is not shut in the face of the wedding guests in the wouted way of fiction, leaving the renders wondering, and in this skeptical age questioning, if here and the contrary, the love interest of the story begins when the lovers have been made man and wife. We yet look to her for an ablebodied hero who does the world a better service than to leave it In the fullness of his manhood when his convictions are ripe, but we admire her sincerity in speaking of the universe as her soul perceives it.

Of Mr. Deland I will tell you one all-embracing fact, that through him his wife is a bappy woman. What better tribute can be

So many shadows lie on the pages of biography that it is pleasant to linger over the aunny chapters. The solitude of her position e read between the lines of George Ellot's jeweled atterance. Bound up with the fruit-age of his gigantic intellect is Carly le's monody of misery for his neglected wife. Charlotte Branto's and Louise Alcott's struggles with adversity sadden our remembrance of them. Too often where we most admire our souls are fain to cry, "Alas, were they but good as they are gifted!" So that it is a good thing to know when behind intellectual achieve-ment lies character, with strength and sweet-ness, for life's small daily needs as well as its mighty issues, when beyond the record of fame and success lies the unwritten history of the happy home.

VI—AIMÉE RAYMOND, M. D.

BY EMMA TRAFFER

LTHOUGH the present generation may have forgotten Henry Jarvis Raymond, the founder of the New York "Times," his influence upon his contempo-raries, both in his jour-nalistic utterances and in his political oratory, is a matter of national history. With Homce Greeley, the senior James Gordon Bennett and Charles A. Dana, Raymond formed a quartette of great editors of whose achievements the nation is rightly of whose achievements the nation is rightly proud, and in honoring whom she is but showing proper gratitude. Dying at the early age of forty-nine, Mr. Raymond left in the newspaper which he had founded, and in his political letters, valuable alike for their sound Americanism and their literary excellence, monuments of his industry and patriotism. And like so many other of our great Americans his name seems destined to further fame through the energies and achievements of at least one of his children.

MISS RAYMOND

Among the younger women physicians in New York City, Dr. Aimée Raymond, the sub-ject of this sketch, and the youngest living child of the late founder of the "Times," promises to hold a rank and pre-eminence very like her futher's position in his profession. Born in the sixtles at a charming spot on Lake Geneva, in Switzerland, while the Ray-position were translated in Engage Aimée we monds were traveling in Europe, Aimée re-ceived every advantage in her early education, which was gained chiefly in Italy and France. Mrs. Raymond, however, who in spite of her long residence abroad remained at heart a long residence abroad remained at heart a thorough American, was extremely desirous that her daughter should complete her education at one of the home schools, and returned to this country for that purpose. In her childhood and early girlhood, Aimée showed marked talent for music, literature and the languages, and at the time of her graduation in New York was a fine pinnist, spoke Italian and French fluently, painted with talent and had written several stories and sketches which had been accepted by metropolitan editors.

But the cureer of the conventional society girl offered few attractions to Miss Raymond;

But the cureer of the conventional society girl offered few attractions to Miss Raymond; the life of fusicion was repugnant to her, and soon after leaving school she determined to devote herself to the study and practice of medicine. This desire on her part was at first discouraged by her relatives, as the requirements and restrictions of the profession are so severe and exacting. They felt, too, that as her father's daughter her undoubted literary abilities should receive consideration and trial before any other talent was forced into use, but Miss Raymond's plea of lack of originality in her literary work, and her very evident ity in her literary work, and her very evident determination to at least test her ability in matters medical prevalled, and she began a course of study at the Woman's Medical Col-lege of the New York Infirmary, from which she was graduated in 1889,

In the first year after her graduation, Dr. Raymond worked in what is known as the "out practice," that is, in the work of medical relief among the tenement house poor. Two years ago she began her private practice at her residence on East Thirtieth Street, where the lives with a set of the lives with a set. she lives with an old friend, and at the same time made her début in the lecture field. During the past winter she has delivered a course of lectures on physiological subjects at the school in New York where she had grad-unted as a girl.

Dr. Raymond, who is a communicant of the Presbyterian Church, has identified herself also with several of the charitable and humane societies in the metropolis. She is physician to the Messiah Home for Children, and has

She holds also the office of corresponding secretary in the Association for the Advancement of Women in Medicine. She has her own clinic in the dispensary of the Woman's Medical College, and to gain greater experience she works in the clinic at Roosevelt Hospital, a privilege for which she gladly pays the sam asked. The practical and unobtrusive assistance which she renders the noale physicians in her hospital connection wins for her the most considerate and courteous treatment.

While Dr. Raymond enjoys her profession so keenly, and it is now a vital part of her existence, she has by no means become a woman of one idea. As the duties of her profession afford her leisure, she attends the meetings of the Working Woman's Sogiety, of which she is an enthusiastic and active member. This society, which is, I believe, the only one of its kind in existence, includes in its membership representatives of forty-nine different trades and professions. It is co-operative in the respect that its members assist and aid one another with their gifts and skill, and many of the sick members can thank Dr. Raymond for her freely given medical advice and efficacious her freely given medical advice and efficacious prescriptions. The main object of the society is the general betterment of all self-support-ing women, and as it is claimed, with a statis-tical basis of support, that in New York City alone there are over three hundred thousand above there are over three hundred thousand of this class, it will be seen that the field of the activity and usefulness of this organization is a large one. Dr. Raymond has distinguished berself on several occasions by giving largely of her abundance and time to the special work of many of the committees of this far-reaching society.

The home life of this young physician approaches closely to the ideal. Her residence is filled with books, music and pictures, and throughout reflects in its furnishing the dainty taste of its mistress. Amid these delightful surroundings Dr. Baymond finds time occasionally to receive her friends, though they do not expect much social entertaining from so busy ally to receive her friends, though they do not expect much social entertaining from so busy a woman as the young physician.

Her love for languages she keeps alive and active by devoting an hour daily to the study of German. Her musical talent, too, is remembered by spare half hours passed in practice at the grand piano in the drawing room. And with all her abilities, however, undoubted as they are, Dr. Raymond's modesty is her thiefest charm.

Her style of heanty is what the French call

Her style of beauty is what the French call chataigne. Her hair is light brown, and her eyes a gray-blue; her complexion fair to correspond with her blonde eyes and hair. In features she resembles her father. The expression of her face is forceful yet intensely gentle. Like so many American women, Dr. Raymond is of medium height and slight, expected flowe. graceful figure.

All young women may gather inspiration from a youth so well spent as has been that of this young physician. At an age when many women—and indeed, many men—begin their careers, she has already accomplished much that speaks of her success in the line she has chosen for berself.

THE NEW YORK SOCIETY GIRL

By Mrs. Burton Harrison

EARLY a score of years have passed since Lawrence Oliphant idetured "the bouncers" of Irene Macgillicuddy's set. The type of the girl of to-day is simple almost to brusquerie in speech, given to athletic sports, connoisseur in horses and dogs, virtuoso in the use of fire-arms, loving out-of-door exercise in any shape, ambitions to be at home in literature, languages, art and music, one or all of them. One is tempted to wish to see in the maiden of our society some of the small conjectives of budding womanhood; but no, she is serious as a sherub, and rather painfully practical than the reverse. Until the age of eighteen she is brought up in comparative seclosion from the world in which her mother takes conspicuous part; she is trained by experts in every detail of the accomplishments specified. One is often ignorant of the existspecified. One is often ignorant of the exist-ence of young girls in the houses of one's friends until by chance they are revealed at a matinee of the opera, sitting demorely in the family box, or at their summer homes, on horseback, or playing at tennis on the lawn. The Dancing Class, controlled by a bery of matrons who carefully select the names sent out upon invitations to belong to it, is ber training ground for polite society. At these classes, meeting in the afternoon or evening once a week, the mothers sit around the halls while the boys and girls go through the exact forms to be observed in the ball-room of the forms to be observed in the ball-room of the future. When the young person is ready to be introduced into society, the mother, as often as not, issues cards for a general afternoon reception of her friends. Gowned in simplest home dress, high at the throat and of pure white, the debutante stands beyond her mother at the chief entrance of the drawing-room. Behind her, piled upon tables or the is seen a veritable hecatomb of flowers sent in by friends to celebrate the hour. guest, after speaking to the mother or chaperone, is then mentioned by name to the debutante, who bows or curtains as she has been taught to do. Later in the afternoon, when the crowd thins out, the girl surrounded by her particular set of friends, displays ber flowher particular set of friends, displays but flow-ers, her gown, her new ring or the string of pearls presented by a good papa. A dinner follows, at which her nother presides, and around which the same young people assem-ble. Here she is queen of the feast, and amid flowers and lights and music and kind words, no wonder that the vista of society seems to her like fairy land. From that day on she is rarely seen in public without her parents, or one of them, or a mplightzed by Google

CHANGES IN FASHIONABLE STATIONERY

By Ada Chester Bond

COMPLETE revolution will be effected in the use of stationery during the coming season. It is decreed by Dume Fashion that pure white will be proper in all things pertaining to paper and card stock, in connec-tion with the unequiviters.

Perfect taste in the use of note paper is becoming of far greater consideration than is the coming of far greater consideration than is the adoption of any ultra style, which might have a short run of favor and be a fad for only a few months. The crushed purples, grass greens and dingy blues have crowded the markets to such an extent that they have finally palled on the sensible taste, and are now to be relegated to the background where they properly belong. It is safe to say that strict good form does not recognize the use of colored papers. Ruled papers are also prohibited. hibited.

CORRECT STYLES AND SIZES

T will be pure white for wedding invitations and announcements; pure white for tea cards and receptions of all kinds; white, a real blue white, for visiting cards, not the cream and pink white so frequently found; white for letters, notes, acceptances and regrets. For invitations to anniversaries of wooden, tin and silver weddings, so often marred by the use of wooden sheets, tinfoil and silver paper, white is to be the only color used. Five sizes use of wooden sheets, tinfoil and silver saper, white is to be the only color used. Five slaes of paper for correspondence—commercial, royal, octavo, billet and mignon—will answer the needs of the fashionable, and the following list describes them: Commercial, for gentlemen's letters, size 4½ x 7½ inches, folding once for a square and twice for a long envelope; Royal, for ladies' letters, 5 x 6½, folding once into an oblong envelope; Octavo, or 3-square, 4½ x 6½ for notes; Billet, or 2-square, 3½ x 6½ for short notes, and Mignon, 3½ x 5½, for regrets and acceptances, each laving square envelopes, into which the sheet folds once.

The revolution is particularly noticeable in fine paper decoration, small and dainty monograms and addresses taking the place of the large, old-fashional clumsy impressions which would be out of place on the small sheets now used. Monogram dies are sometimes stamped in the upper left-hand corner of the sheet, but more frequently in the top center in the bronzes, silver and gold.

Addresses are also popular on sheets, but also find proper place on the flaps of envelopes, where they aid the postman in effecting a speedy return to the writer in case a better direction is needed.

The cause of heraldry is gaining in America, direction is needed.

The cause of heraldry is gaining in America, and many elaborate crests and full costs-of-arms are cut on steel dies, at prices ranging from five to thirty dollars, while the cost of illuminating some of them is in the neighbor-hood of five dollars per quire.

STYLES IN FORM AND ENGRAVING

THE engraving is medium heavy round script, hold and elegant without any flourishes. The faint, angular style is very fittle used now, and is not considered in good form. The paper, inside and outside envelopes and and stock should be white, beavy, smooth, or kid finish, which is slightly rough.

More attention is paid to little details such as having "r" and "rs" in "Mr." and "Mrs." above the line (an English fashion), the word "and," between "Mr." and "Mrs." written in full instead of with the usual mark; all names and dates in full; honour spelled with a "u.

and dates in full; honour spelled with a "u, and writing street addresses in full instead of using figures. Abbreviating "Street" and "Avenue" is also prohibited, and the year is considered more proper when written in full—eighteen hundred and ninety-two.

Three popular sizes are billet, octavo and imperial, which latter is a square sheet larger than the octavo; the billet sheet is best for short names and has a smaller style of engraving than the larger sheets, which admit of longer names in larger script. Outside en-velopes should be of same quality as inner ones, and a small die with the address embossed ones, and a small die with the address embosses on the flap prevents any invitations going astray in the mails. The inner envelope is without gum, while the outer one senis tightly, although a bit of white wax impressed

Forms vary slightly in the wording. For instance: "Mr. and Mrs. — invite you to be present," or "request your presence," or "depresent," or "request your presence," or "de-sire your presence at the marriage ceremony," or "wedding reception." In such cases "and," supplants "to" between the names of the contracting parties. When the young hady is an orphan the invitation is headed "you are requested to be present "or "the honour of your presence is requested."

The groom's name should be spelled in full, and the first and second name of the bride-and the first and second name of the bride most also appear on the invitations.

Invitations should be issued two weeks be-fore the weeking, and three weeks is not too early, particularly in circles where there are many social engagements.

When a reception follows a wedding to which only a few relatives and immediate friends are to be invited, a small card, on which is the hour of the ceremony, is inclosed with the reception invitation.

Pirst-class stationers do not carry a stock of envelopes made up, but make each lot as ordered, thus insuring freshness and preventing discoloring of the paper by the gum. Both lots of envelopes are sent home in advance, upon request, to allow of their being addressed. The sheets follow later, carefully folded with slips of tissue paper within each,

MODELS FOR WEDDING INVITATIONS

THE following form of a wedding invitation is one adopted by society leaders, and leaves no chance for improvement:

MR. AND MRS. ELBERT JACKSON request the honour of your presence at the marriage of their daughter MARGUERITE YOUNG

MR. HARRISON WHITELY PRESCOTT on Wednesday, March the twelfth eighteen hundred and ninety-two at seven o'clock ST. D. VID'S CHAPEL

In the event of issuing five hundred to a thousand or more invitations it would be im-perative to inclose a card of admittance to the church, thus excluding the crowd of curiosity seekers that always collect at large church weddings. It would read:

PHILADELPHIA

Please present this card at ST. DAVID'S CHAPEL

If a reception follows the wedding another card must be added, reading:

RECEPTION from eight until ten o'clock 3553 UPSAL AVENUE

In case of a noon wedding a card is inclosed reading:

BREAKFAST at one o'clock WINDERMERE

ANNOUNCEMENTS AND AT-HOME CARDS

WEDDING announcements are similar VV to invitations, except that the word "announce" is used and the particulars of hour and church are discarded, thus;

MR. AND MRS. CHARLES HOWLAND announce the marriage of their daughter FLORENCE DANIELS to Mr. George Barclay Rudolphson

Thursday, December twentieth eighteen lifundred and ninety-three PHILADELPHIA

When towns are not so well known as the large cities, the name of the State is affixed or placed on the line underneath, Another form is to omit the names of parents and simply announce:

although the first-named style is preferred if parents are living.

The following eard may be inclosed, stating future address and time of receiving:

MR. AND MRS. GEORGE B. RUDOLPHSON or a card reading as follows would be proper:

Betrothal cards are sometimes issued, but this is principally a Jewish custom, and not

SUGGESTIONS FOR VISITING CARDS

VISITING cards are used in all seasons, and are a necessary credential or pass port within society realms. The size, tint, and style of script denote instantly, to the educated eye, the owner's knowledge of the most approved customs of the social world.

Cards should never be written, and an engraved facsimile upon a visiting card is in decidedly had taste.

A correct card for married ladies is pure white, fine in texture, not too heavy but of the weight known as 3-ply and must be of smooth surface and in size follow the prevail-ing style, which at present is nearly square. The name should be spelled in full with the "rs" in "Mrs." above the line, The engraving is invariably round script

The eldest married woman in the eldest branch of the family may, if she desires, omit all except last name, thus;

any, in the left.

A daughter's card is slightly smaller than the mother's and of the same style with the prefix "Miss." During her first year in society her name is engraved upon her mother's card, If the eldest unmarried daughter, she is known as "Miss Van Artsdalen," otherwise her full baptismal name is given. When two daughters enter society nearly together their names appear on their mother's card thus:

If she desires, a widow may, for social pur-If she desires, a widow may, for social purposes only, continue to use the name she bore as a wife, and leading stationers advise this. "Mr. and Mrs." cards are used only during the first year after marriage. Men's cards are of the same quality as those of women but not quite so heavy and in size much smaller. The present approved size is 3½ x 1 9-16.

The prefix "Mr." is invariable, and the engraving small round script.

Infants' cards are not much used, but it is proper to announce the birth of a child by sending out a small card with name in full upon it and the date of birth in the left-hand corner:

GEORGE ELLIS FRANKLIN

This is inclosed with the mother's card. As in other stationery the card board for all cards must be of the first quality only. The edges must be cleanly cut, the engraving uniform and distinct, the hair lines carefully printed and unbroken, and the entire card free from mark or blemish; in fact, it is the attention that is really to such the learn detail that tion that is paid to each and every detail that produces the perfect effect demanded by fashionable people.

AFTERNOON TEAS: EVENING RECEPTIONS

S a representative card for invitation to A an afternoon ten the following will be found correct:

> MRS. HAMILTON A. CURTIS THE MISSES CURTIS

Tuesday, January twentieth Tea, from five until seven 4382 Walnut Street

It is sent out a week or ten days previous to the date arranged. The card is generally square, about a biliet size, and double envelopes should be used, although many fashionable people use single envelopes only, and it cannot be called incorrect to do so.

In the event of a friend receiving with the hostess her card is inclosed also.

Evening receptions are printed on octavo sheets, sometimes on cards, and read:

MR. AND MRS. HENRY E. ALLANDALE MRS. FRANCES L. ALLANDALE

Wednesday evening, March fourth at eight o'clock 1500 NORTH BROWN STREET

If a formal reception, the hours "from eight until ten o'clock" are named. The backneyed "R.s.v. p." should be omitted altogether. It is not only old style but in bad taste, as the re-cipient of an invitation is expected to know what is required. "At-homes" are printed on billet or octavo cards, but are used for afternoon or early evening hours, the sheet being correct for evening receptions.

Where distinguished visitors or others are to be honored by presentation to the friends of the host and hostess, the invitations read thus:

The same form answers for luncheon or breakfast by the substitution of either of these words for dinner. The word "evening" must never appear in a formal dinner invitation. There is an endless variety of place cards, hand decorated being used more than those stamped from dies. Pretty effects are had by combinations of ribbon and cards. The best taste is shown in a plain white card of medium size, bevel edge, with the hostess's monogram or crest in upper left-hand corner or top center, stamped in silver or gold. The name of guest is painted in angular script in center of card to match the gold or silver. Menus are seldom seen except at public dinners where they appear in claborate style, some being really handsome souvenirs.

A GROUP OF ARTISTIC PORTIÈRES

By Margaret Sims

OOD taste and a regard for the true principles of decoration seem to demand a certain simplicity in the treatment of por-tières and hangings, as a protest against the dis-torted arrangements of drapery, which, to some extent, found favor a little while ago, gaining, for a short period, a surprising popularity.

A portière, which is in itself a work of art, is best hung to a pole or rod on rings, that its intrinsic beauty may be fully displayed, while it can yet be pushed to one side at pleasure. always so that the effect is graceful, though not appearing at all strained or forced. Festoous, or a multiplication of loops and curves, should be avoided.

When the housewife desires to decorate her own portières, the methods she may adopt are many and varied. The most popular are, in this busy age, naturally those which give the best and most effective result with the least possible labor. Such are appliqué work, bold designs in outline, and a mixture of needle-work and painting, which, when skillfully managed, has unlimited possibilities. The choice of materials is wide, and can be made to suit all purses without the sacrifice of artistic foelings, for nowadays the most beautiful colorings can be obtained in even the cheapest fabrics. Charming and inexpensive curtains can be made by applying a striking design cut out of a French flowered cretonne and applying it by means of a coarse buttonhole-stitch with tapestry wool to a foundation of serve or Bolton sheeting; the effect is further improved by veining the leaves and touching up the flowers with silk.

The pattern may be variously arranged, either as a border or as a frieze and dado, with powdering of forms over the body of the curtain; or, as a matter of fact, in any way that seems best and most effective for the purpose. Designs may also be cut out in velvet or plush to be applied upon woolen goods, with a couched outline of gold cord, or finished off with a buttonhole-stitch of heavy silk, with veins and markings made also of the silk. Be careful in cutting out the forms for use in this fashion, that they are all the same way of the goods, or the different appearance of the pile, as it runs in various directions, will have a very unpleasant effect. Velvet or plush, that is to be applied, should have linen

VERY effective decorations can be rapidly executed in what is named "Old Lady's Work," because it is easy and not trying to the eyes. Fruit subjects are the most suitable, such as the orange design in illustration No. I. The curtain itself is serge, the oranges are of plush in their natural color, and are slipstitched on invisibly with silk to match, being mised slightly by means of a wadding of cotton wool. The result is that as the plush catches the light the fruit has the effect of being highly shaded. Where one orange overlaps the other, the under one should not be raised, and may be of a darker shade. The leaves are of thin woolen materials in various tints, and can be applied by a couched line or buttonhole-stitch. The best method of getting an assortment of colors is to obtain, if possible, a package of samples from a dry goods store; enough will be found in each plece for several leaves. The stems are worked with a coarse woolen or silken thread, and the blossoms in white silk. blossoms in white silk.

A DELICATE AND HANDSOME HANGING

I LLUSTRATION No. 2 is an example of somewhat more elaborate and difficult work. It is intended for a delicate and handsome hanging. The foundation is of Roman satin or mail cloth, of a light tint; the roses, which are large, bold and simple in ontline, are applied in cream-colored sik veivet, and painted with tapestry-dyes, to imitate palepinkish roses, the color of the velvet forming the high lights. The leaves and stalks are embroidered in silk; the ribbon is applied where it is indicated in the design, and is shaded also with the dyes. By this means a very decoravery decora-tive effect is obtained with but little labor. Another method, en-tailing more work, but with perhaps a richer and more truly artistic result, is to solidly embroider the floral part of the design, filling in the ribbon forms with some fancy stitch.

A PAIR OF LOUIS XVI CURTAINS (No. 4)

SOME MORE IDEAS FOR INEXPENSIVE CURTAINS

FOR an inexpensive curtain, blue denim I makes an excellent ground. It may be variously decorated. A favorite way is to use white only for the design, which may be either outlined in heavy white cord, or may be of a bold pattern, applied in white and embedished with embroidery in coarse thread or silk.

Linen tapestry canvas is com-paratively cleap, and comes in different grayish and neutral shades that make an excellent ground for bold designs in coarse embrodery, and lovely effects may be obtained by the use of subdued tones upon Very coming hans for a library may be made by choosing a mediaval scene, or copying some old tapestry sub-ject, and rendering it in coarse darning. To carry this out well, however, requires artistic skill and a certain amount of imperination. There need never be any difficulty in procuring pretty and artistic curtains in thin fabrics when required, so cheaply may they be purchased nowa-days. A good idea for finish-ing light muslin hangings is to make a very deep hear, into which is inserted some bright colored sates or silk which colored sateen or silk, which harmonizes with the decoration of the room. They are then tied back with ribbons to match Cheese-cloth is still used for hangings, and may be decorated with designs in delicate colors, tinted and outlined in the man-ner-described further on. Rather more expensive, but exquisite in its effect, for some purposes, is bolting-cloth, which comes fifty inches wide. Dainty floral designs embroidered in the palest Dresden-china shades, make pretty curtains and repay the trouble expended on them, being extremely delicate in character.

A SIMPLE AND EFFECTIVE DESIGN

BOLD floral and conventional designs may be tinted on cream or ecru-colored Roman

BOLD floral and conventional designs may be tinted on cream or écru-colored Roman satin and outlined with rope-silk which tones with the washes used. The design in illustration No. 3 could be treated in this way, though it would be also very effective outlined with gold on plush or flax velours, the pressure of the outline causing a good suggestion of light and shade.

The indelible tapestry dyes are the most suitable for the purpose of tinting, but they need careful handling in order to lay them evenly and to avoid their running. The subject must be drawn out first, either being transferred or sketched lightly in charcoal. The material should be firmly stretched and laid flat to receive the washes. Ordinary hoghair brushes are used. It is best to select the silks first, as the dyes may be readily mixed to tone with any color, and if the opposite course is pursued it may often be difficult to procure the exact shades required. In painting, commence in the center of the leaf or flower, working outward to the edge as the brush becomes almost dry. The design may be slightly shaded with great advantage.

THE Louis XVI curtains (Illustration No. 4) may be embroidered, but would be much more rapidly executed on silk tapestry canvas with the Grénié dyes.

canvas with the Grénie dyes.

In the drawing, one curtain is left without being looped back, in order to show the arrangement of the design. The ornament should be in shades of gold, for which Indian yellow, much diluted, is used for the flat wash; and brown, mixed with the yellow for the half-tones and shadows. The roses and leaves are painted very daintily in their natural colors. A light shade of ponceau, together with a little yellow, is employed for the local tint of the flowers. The leaves should be kept delicate and not worked up too much. A void monotony by making them of various shades, but painting

Some extremely artistic embroidered portières were made some time ago under the direction of a large decorating firm in New York. The ground was handsome plush of a beautiful neutral tone, the design being a banging or-chid arranged across the top, and, coming about one-third down the curtains, a swarm of butterflies were clinging a swarm of butterflies were clinging and fluttering around the blossoms and scattered irregularly over almost the whole space. Both drawing and execution were excellent. The design was worked directly upon the material. In many cases solid embroidery, intended to go upon a plush ground, is done upon linen and afterward transferred, often with an outline of Japanese gold thread. Designs are frequently rendered with extremely good effect by working portions of them solidly, the rest being outlined or partially filled in. The Japanese are particularly sue-

A S to the linings of curtains, much depends on their position and whether the backs of the hangings are visible from a room beyond, in which case care must be taken that the material selected for the lining goes well both with the coloring of the portiere and with the general tone of the next apartment. Chosen with taste and judgment, the two sides of a portière should, if necessary, be capable of harmonizing widely different schemes of color,

When both sides of the curtain are in this way almost equally important, the lining may be, if desired, of the richest material, handsomely embroidered silk or tapestry hangings being frequently backed with plush or flax velours. This latter is especially popular with decorators, being comparatively inexpensive, while it is manufactured in a great variety of artistic colors. For ordinary linings almost any fabric may be employed; silk and satin of different qualities, and satem are much used; also in some cases a woolen mamuch used; also in some cases a woolen ma-terial, such as merino. Heavy curtains, such as those of plush, are often interlined with Canton-flannel.

Many people who covet for their window or door hangings the handsomely bronded curtains for which very high prices are asked by interior decorators, do not realize that they might obtain them for a much less sum if they purchased the material and had them made up at home. A woman of great taste who, while lies or to a cover their states who, while lies or to a cover their states. they purchased the material and had them made up at home. A woman of great taste who, while living in what is termed good style, had yet not the wealth of a millionaire at her command, recently wished to refurnish her parlor, which was becoming old-fashioned and, perhaps, a little shabby into the bargain. She was her own artist and decorator, superintending the entire remodeling of it in style, while utilizing what was possible of the furniture she already possessed. All the materials used were the handsomest of their kind, and the cost was but a small proportion of what it used were the handsomest of their kind, and the cost was but a small proportion of what it would have been if given in the hands of a regular decorating house. All her expedients can not be entered into here, but the plan pursued for the curtains may be noted. She visited a store devoted to the sale of theatrical costames and furnishings, and selected a fine piece of old French brocade in soft shades of blue that harmonized with the scheme of her room; hought some dull old-gold satin for the lining, and gave them to her maid to make up for her. Instead of having lace or muslin curtains with them she had a double row of deep lace sewn on, rather full down the edges, and all her friends were anxious to find out wherever she could have purchased them, so rich and uncommon a set of hangings did they make. #### ARRANGING CHILDREN'S FROLICS

A FEW GENERAL HINTS CALCULATED TO MAKE THEM SUCCESSFUL

N offering suggestions for children's parties, fêtes and frolics, it is well to define at the start the age when young people may be safely reckoned as children. At fifteen the line of child life is supposably passed. Then, although for several passed. Then, although for several years these same young people are not expected to appear in society, they are no longer "children." This page, therefore, limits itself to suggestions for young masters and misses under fifteen, and aims to offer to them the best kinds of diversions—something bright, interesting and enjoyable, and at the same time wholesome and refined.

Children cannot has early been their educations.

Children cannot too early begin their edu-cation in polite manners—not "company man-ners," such as are sometimes put on with one's best clothes, but in those well-accepted forms of good behavior which mark the true lady and gentleman, the kind which cannot be put on nor taken off, for they are a part of the child's growth.

THE acceptance of an invitation to a children's party or fete is a pledge to the hostess that by kindness and courtesy the invited child will do all in his or her power to vited child will do all in his or her power to assist in making the party a happy and successful one. Any lapse from this would mark a child as unamiable and ill bred. Invitations to a child's fite, certainly if it is to be en continue, ought to be sent out at least two weeks in advance, and so worded that those invited may know the kind of fite intended. The hostess may also suggest the kind of costume desired. Small stationery, with suitable dedesired. Small stationery, with suitable de-sign in the corner, is preferred. If the party is not to be too large, and the child is able to write neatly and legibly, invitations written by the young host or hostess are best. The following invitation directs the costume of

"Miss Belle Carter will receive ber friends from Fairy Land on Wednesday evening, August the Tenth, from 4 to 8 at 'The Lilacs,' Lake-view Ave. Will you kindly costume as Stella, the Star Fairy."

The guests shall decide what fashion of costume will suit the request of the hostess; or it is quite proper to consult her with reference to the matter. The mother's card should be to the matter. The mother's card should be sent in the same envelope with the invitation. It is both courieous and kind on the part of each guest to dress as tastefully and suitably as possible, though as a rule it is not required of them to make their costames expensive. For a "Greenaway" or "Mother Guose" fête, for instance, it is well to follow very carefully the prints given in the best illustrated editions of the books.

MATINEE fites or parties are best for children under ten years. From two to six are good hours. Older misses and lads to six are good hours. Older misses and lads should be limited to not later than ten o'clock. Dancing at suitable bours in home parlors is a pretty and harmless diversion—far better than some of the rollicking games allowed in many homes. Just at this point, even in this day of enlightened motherhood, a warning word may be given. In no case should games of forfeit in which those forfeits must be paid with kisses be sanctioned. "But our children are so innocent," thoughtless mothers urge. So theer are, and it is the mother's special care that they remain so. Sensitive and refined children are often forced to play such games because it is the rule of the party, and they do not wish to appear prudish or disobliging; yet in every case they do so under protest.

In arranging for children's amusements the In arranging for circures a annaements the dramatic or imitative quality ought to be recognized. A children's party in which all go dressed in their prettiest gowns and suits is only half the good time it would be were they to wear some sort of fancy costume represent-ing ideal people whom they have seen or read about, even though their garments may be fashioned out of the most inexpensive fabrics, SAW an ideal play-room not long since, L where, in addition to a generous furnishing in the way of fors and games, the chiling in the way of fors and games, the chil-dren had quite an extensive wardrobe made out of chesp cambric, jeans and sateens, which they donned while playing different kinds of games. The boys had each a policeman's, a car driver's and conductor's suit; also soldier, sailor, coachman and schoolmaster "rigs." By special petition little Ted, the youngest of the flock, had secured a bear-skin suit so that he could "relay real bear and cover on the he could "play real bear and cover up the growl." The girls had "grown-up dresses like mamma's" for morning, dinner, street and evening wear, also aprous, caps, etc., etc., to put on while washing, sweeping, dusting and cooking. In addition to these, the children variety of paper costumes -some cut from brown paper and pasted together, others a bright colored tissue paper—which were really artistic in design. While wearing these their play became much more realistic and enjoyable.

REGARDING refreshments, there can be but one safe conclusion. An abundance of wholesome food, delicately, daintily and palatably prepared—such as sandwiches, blacuits, pastries (if not heavy or too rich), ices, and sweetments of various kinds may be safely eaten by children even under the excitement and fatigue of a prolonged frolic and unusual hours; but nuts, raisins, French candies, and hours; but nots, raisins, French candies, and heavy fruits like bananas, dates, figs or raisins are very unwholesome. Plate souvenirs, some-thing unique in the line of bonbons or pretty hand bonquets tied with pretty ribbon, also tasteful table decorations, are a delight to little people. And the presence of their parents and friends adds greatly to their enjoyment.

Arranged and Described by Mrs. A. G. Lewis

A TOM THUMB WEDDING FÊTE

VERY YOUNG CHILDREN

HIS featival engages the service of the youngest children. The idea is to reproduce, as nearly as possible, the interesting features of a ceremonious wedding, the party to consist of children of from four to eight years of age dressed in exact imitation of grown-up people. Two of the timest children should be chosen for the bride and groom. The former wears the conven-

The former wears the conven-tional bride's costume-dress, white or cream tional bride's costume—dress, white or cream colored with long train and vell, also bouquet, gloves, etc., exactly like a real bride. The groom, best man, ushers, papers and other male guests wear the usual gentleman's evening costume—black swallow-tail cont, low-cut vest with white bosom, necktie and gloves, long trousers and patent leather shoes. Mammas wear train dresses of mode or lavender shades and powdered hair. Paper also may whiten their locks, since baldness cannot be conveniently managed. The maid of honor and bridesmaids—the number of the latter varying from one to six—wear pretty, light varying from one to six-wear pretty, light ovening tollettes without trains. The little ladies should wear flowers and carry fans, the maid of honor bearing a basket filled with blossoms which she scatters along the path of the bride,

The party enters the room to the music of Lobengrin's wedding march, in the following bridesmalis (four or six in number), brides mamma, leaning upon the arm of her eldest son, groom's papa and mamma and members of families followed by guests.

The rector in surplice, with groom and best man, await the approaching party. Papa gives away the bride, and the bride and groom take their places before the rector. The bridal party arranges itself upon the platform thus:

1 Bride, 2 Groom, 3 Maid of honor, 4 Best man, 5 Rector, 6 and 7 Bride's parents, 8 and 9 Groom's parents, 10 to 17 Inclusive, bridesmaids, 18 to 25 Inclusive, usages. At left bride's friends; right, groom's friends.

The ceremony is represented by a succession of very beautiful tableaux without curtain:

1 Bride and groom join right hands, and the rector holds the book as though reading.

2 Presentation of the ring. 3 Blessing the kneeling pair. 4 Benediction. 5 Saluting the bride.

During the tableaux a piane or organ accom-paniment is played softly, the music following closely and appropriately the natural changes of the tableaux.

After suitable congratulations, the wedding party is scated in small chairs upon the platform and a dainty wedding collation of cake, ices and coffee is served. Small hundmaidens wearing white caps and aprons do the serving, the salvers, glasses, dishes, spoons, doilies, etc., being of small pattern.

While the serving is still going on an entertainment called "An Hour in Lilliput Land," may be introduced. This is given by the little people, and should be as varied as possible. Very small children can assist in the musical part with singing and the use of "nine wired Very small children can assist in the musical part with singing and the use of "nine wired bells," specially arranged for hand playing. They can also jingle tambourines as accom-paniment to the plano. The supply of kin-dergarten songs and games is now so ample there can be little difficulty in finding mate-rial for an entertainment of this kind.

A "PRO AND CON" PARTY

IN WHICH THE EDUCATIVE ELEMENT IS MINGLED WITH PLEASURE

EQUIRE that the company be divided into two sets. They "choose up" after the fashion of a spelling match, then stand in opposite lines.

A story is started at the head of the line by one of the Pros, who must begin each sentence with a word whose prefix is "pro," and not word whose prefix is "pro," and not word whose prefix is "pro," and not use the same word twice. He may go on as long as possible in this way. But at the first moment of hesitation a Con catches up the story, beginning every new sentence with a new word prefixed by "con."

This seems to be a very simple game, but with a company of bright students there is an unlimited scope for the enlargement of one's vecabulary, and the contest becomes one of deepest interest. If a word is wrongly chosen, or incorrectly classified, or mispro-nounced, it omits the player from the game. When the speaker besitates simply, and the narrative goes to the other side, he may still stand in line and take up the story when his turn comes again. When the number is narrowed down to one or two upon either side the contest grows exciting. The one who is last to fail wins for himself, also for his side.

A FAIRY FOLK FROLIC

UPERSTITIOUS All-Hallow-E'en invites the fairy folk for a frolic ex-costume in all the glory of tulle, tarletan and spangles. The "Brownies," too, are called from their mysterious haunts to take part in this delightful revel.

Horse rooms may be so transformed that one may well believe that fairy world and fairy folk are a reality. Many houses are ar-ranged with three rooms connected by folding doors—double pariors and a room in the L. The L room is reserved for the fairy grotto,

L. The L room is reserved for the fairy grotto, and is decorated thus:

Cover the side walls with green cambric—not too dark nor too smoothly placed. Loop the same in easy festoons to cover the upper wall. Then among these festoons fasten trailing vines and small tree branches. Upon the cambric covering the side walls make rough, free, charronal sketches of rocks, recesses caserra and smaller grottes. Intercesses, caverns and smaller grottos. Inter-mingled with and covering the sharper out-lines place with judicious taste small trees, branches and vines, liberally decorated with spangles, shining pendants and baubles. Arrange also glittering draperies of fabrics, known as cloth of gold and silver, with silver and gold fringes. Stars, diamond and heartand gold fringes. Stars, diamond and heart-shaped figures cut from gilt, amber and silver paper should be added. These decorations may be pinned lightly to the cambric. Place a few lamps with chimneys of red, blue and yellow glass, and, under their soft tinted light, the scene is indeed beautiful.

The parlors can be similarly arranged if desired, otherwise the rooms should be cleared, desired, otherwise the rooms should be cleared, the carpet covered with white cloth and the general decorations may well consist of bright colored tarletans and flowers. In the center of the room suspend a bright-colored hoop to which gay ribbons, not less than three yards long, should be fastened at equidis-tant points. With these, each claiming a color to match their costume, the children restricts the faire frolic the changes of which perform the fairy frolic, the changes of which are similar to the May pole dance, except the final braiding of the May pole. These same ribbons may be used later in the scarf revel—a beautiful melange of music, color and mation.

Fairy costumes for little girls are of tarletan or tulle, liberally ornamented with glittering fringes and spangles. The queen ought to wear a crown and elaborately fashioned dress; the wee godmother a somber costume, brown bonnet and spectacles. Little boys as "Brownles," wearing closely fitting suits of brown jean with hoods of the same fabric, upon which a pair of upright rabbit-shaped ears four inches long are sewed.

HALLOW-E'EN PLEASURES

A FROLIC FOR THE EVENING WHEN THE SPELL OF THE FUTURE ABOUNDS

HE following suggestions for an American Hallow-E'en re-produces many features of a delightful party given by a young farmer and his wife among the Doneglan Glens of Ireland: Over every door of the house and rooms apple parings hang, and beside each a maiden watches eagerly the lad whom the fairies have chosen to pass under it first.

Meanwhile she sits busily cutting out letters of the alphabet, which later are to be set sailing in basins of water. With infinted cheeks she is to blow the letters into line so they shall spell the charmed name of her dearest friend. dearest friend.

The initial letter it forms begins the name of the future sweetheart. Then the apple must be eaten and the seeds stuck upon the palm of the hand. These are named for as many different friends, then tossed over the heft shoulder—the one remaining is the true heart chosen by fairies.

Again, salt herring (in Ireland they must have been playfully stolen) are broiled with-out turning, eaten with hot tongs, then "dreamed on" without drink. The dreams, supposed to be ruled over by fairy folk, are "sure to come true." Then bannocks are "aure to come true." Then bannocks are fried upon a griddle by the lads, and whoever turns one without breaking it will some day win the maiden who mixed the batter. Hazle-nuts are burned and their ashes carefully done up in packages. These are hidden under the pillow to ensure happy dreams.

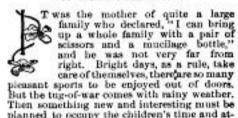

Then corn popping, molasses boiling and chestnut roasting goes on. Sometimes but two kernels of corn are put in the skillet and over it two friends bend to take note of their over it two menos bend to aske new or these future fortune. If the two kernels pop de-corously inside the skillet, they are to remain friends forever. If one kernel pops outside the skillet the one toward whom it pops will be the breaker of that friendship. If both go

Dancing led by rollicking music goes on until midnight. Then under a special spell the fairy folk reveal by signs, well understood among these superstitions people, their fortunes for the coming year. tunes for the coming year.

LITTLE girls from eight to twelve may give a "Reception to Royalty," by collecting pictures of kings and queens, emperors and empresses, princes and princesses of various royal courts. While cutting them out carefully, and preparing them so that they may stand alone, mamma may tell them the story of their royal lives and something about the country and people where they live. The "standers" are made by pasting a strip of moderately thick paper or pasteboard an inch wide, perhaps, full length at the back of the picture. Let the posteboard broaden at the neel; cut it an inch beyond the toe. When partly dry bend at the beel to form a right angle. The figures can then stand quite firmly, and be moved from place to place.

*III— THE DUCHESS" BY ISABEL A. MALLON

HE said in a laughing way, HE said in a laughing way,
"They call me 'The Duchess,' because I never looked like the ones you see in flesh and blood!"
You suddenly remember that the average duchess is red of face, hooked of nose, and badly gowned, while the one standing before you is a very tiny woman, slight but well formed. Her hair is of a light-brown shade, knotted loosely on top of her head, and breaking away into most fascinating little curls all ing away into most fascinating little curls all over her forehead. From under this frame look out two large dark-brown eyes, with thick curly lashes, eyes that are bright and sparkling with delight, as if the world were full of sweet things. The mouth is small, but determined, and the whole expression of the face is that of a woman of wit, good temper and sweetness.

" THE DUCHESS "

As for her frock! Well, no duchess ever wore such a lovely ten-gown. It is of soft, rich plush, with some old ruffles of lace about the wrist and throat, and the tiny feet peeping the wrist and throat, and the tiny test peeping in and out from under her petticost are in the most bewitching Louis Quinze shoes, just such shoes as "Phyllis," or "Modile Bawn," "Lillian," or "Mrs. tieoffrey" might have delighted in. Now, you know who it is. It is Mrs. Margaret Hangerford, who has given to you and me, and to everybody who knows how to read, those delightful love stories, full of brightness full of wit, and as clear and of brightness, full of wit, and as clear and pure as a glass of water taken from a well by the wayside. Few women have as many ar-dent admirers as "The Duchess;" few women dent admirers as "The Duchess;" few women who have written novels have as great a right to this admiration, for few have made love as pure and benuriful a thing, few have created as loving and lovable characters, and none have depicted the churms of the Irish gentlefolk as has this woman. We think of the Irish famine, we think of the Irish peasant, but we are so far off that we forget that on the Emerald list there is a gentry blue-blooded, kind of heart and courtly of manner. And it has been left to this lipy little statuette blooded, kind of beart and courtly of manner.

And it has been left to this tiny little statuette of Dresden ware to deplet these people.
About her personally: She married when very young, and her husband died in less than six years, leaving her with three tiny girls to care for. In 1883 she married Mr. Henry Hangerford, of Cahirmore, and she is the mother of six small people, one of whom is the most delightful boby of a year, rejoicing in the name of Tom. He is just such a baby sa she writes about; a roly-poly fellow, who can be picked up in your arms and kissed can be picked up in your arms and kissed until he laughs with glee, and you are physically wenry of sweetness best working hours are in the morning; and so for three hours every forenoon she may be found in her den. It is not the sort of a room you usually think of as a workshop. There is a buge grate in it, and the log fire blazes up as if to suggest the pictures in its flames for the fair occupant to see. Hook cases are all about the room, overflowing with dictionaries, books of reference, novels and histories, while about are flowers in plenty. Charating pictures are on the wall, and lovely bits of the valuable old china to which "The Duchess" is devoted. The desk is a murvel of neatness, every park-The desk is a marvel of meathess, every parkage or bundle of manuscript being thed and scribble my notes on the last sheets of my friends' letters. Wouldn't they be surprised if they knew that the last sheet became the scene of a love offsir, a full account of a musder, a beycotting, or, most likely of all, a fir-tation? I am not a very good sleeper, so I am very apt to plan out my scenes at night, and write them in the morning. Write with regularity? Sometimes I have written the last chapter of a book first-a good situation will come to me, I will write it out, and later on write all around it.

In this series of "Faces We Seddom See" the following sketches, each accompanied with portrait, have ben printed:

"'Phyllis' was my first book. And do you know, all my family are in the army, and I am the only one who has ever drifted into this sort of thing? Yes, I have written twenty-seven novels, and a lot of short articles besides. At school of thing? Yes, I have written twenty-seven novels, and a lot of short articles besides. At school
I took the prize always for composition, and my greatest pleasure used to come, when I was a tiny tot, from inventing fairy stories, and watching how spellbound the other children became when I told them. I laugh whenever I think that I was only ten years old when I wrote a ghost story that frightened me so I could not go to sleep until I had gotten the bedelothes over my head. I regard this as the greatest work of my life. At eighteen I began to write regularly, and have never stopped. Yes, I am very proud of the Irish gentry, and I am glad that you Americans like the picture of them given in Roesmoyne. I am the daughter of a clergyman, the Rev. Canon Hamilton, rector of one of the oldest churches in Ireland, and Sg.
Faughnan's Cathedral in Ross, Carbery, County Cork. My grandfather was John Hamilton, of Besington, Dunboyne, thirteen miles from Dublin. We came over from Scotland to Ireland in the reign of James the First. I am more than happy; I have a full, complete life, in which my only trouble is a review. I have never overcome my terror of one, and as each arrives I am a coward before it is read. have never overcome my terror of one, and as each arrives I am a coward before it is read.

"As to the origin of my nom de plume, there is not very much to say about it. Many years ago while engaged upon 'Phyllis,' I bappened to attend an 'At bome' at the house of one of my intimate friends. As I was about to enter the reception-room my was about to enter the reception-room my host saw me and came forward. He waved the footman back, and himself announced me to the guests, as 'Her Grace, The Duchess.' Very solutionly he said it, and being all well known to each other, the laugh was universal. Then somebody else took up the plot, and said the title well became me. I was a person of such an 'august presence, being full five feet in height, and at that time very young and slight. This still further delighted us all, and from that hour the sobriquet clung to me. It was all very foolish, very frivolous, very light-hearted, but we were all young together, and a laugh seemed to us then the best life could give. In England I am not known by this title. My editors here strongly disapprove of any making use of it; but on disapprove of my making use of it; but on the first sheets of 'Phyllis' it was inadver-tently printed, and these sheets, uncorrected, were sent across the water. Hence the Ameritently printed, and these sheets, uncorrected, were sent across the water. Hence the American knowledge of me by that name."

Having a beautiful home, and being the head of a happy family, Mrs. Hungerford seldom goes away, and when she does her hushand declares that everything goes wrong, while as for the children they set up a pierwing moan when it is suggested that the lady of the manor should be out of their sight even for a few days. In 1889 "The Duchess" went to London, and it is pretty to see how her face lights up as she tells of her reception there.

"The Duchess" is happiest when she is at work in her garden; she digs and delves and clips and investigates weeds, and decades that they shall be turned out, and is assisted in her work by a bevy of handsone children, who are healthy and obedient, who take to mother each story of happiness or sorrow, and who believe that to help mother in the garden, or to be near mother any place, is a supreme delight. In all her work Mrs. Hungerford has shown her love of thildren and her love of bowe life, and after you see the dear chicks that she has herself, you can quite understand how she can write of them so well.

Her husband? Well, what are her heroes? He adores his wife; he is a great athlete; he rides, drives, shoots, fishes, and does all equally well. It is an idyllic home, but it would not be if it were not that the home mother is so overflowing with joy and giadness, with love and kindness, that she imburs each one near her with some of her own virtues. The women who are careful as to the

each one near her with some of her own vir-tues. The women who are cureful as to the books they put in their daughters' hands—and all women should be this—need never be afraid at giving a book that bears upon it the signa-ture of "The Duchess." Never goody-goody ture of "The Duckess." Never goody-goody, never sinking into the skim milk weakness of many women writers, her stories are also-lutely sweet and pure, full of piquancy, full of innocent love making, full of fin. She paints men and women, girls and boys, at their best, and as only a bright Irish woman can. There and as only a bright Irish woman can. There are few American women who have not laughed with "Dicky Brown," mourned over the boycotting in "Rossmoyne," been happy and sad with "Phyllis," or watched the gradual growing of love between "Lillian" and her guardian. It is unfortunate that there are not more writers who have not only the not more writers who have not only the piquancy, but the goodness of "The Duchess."

Her home is at St. Brenda's, Bandon, County Cork, and a visitor there is given, by the pretty hostess that hearty Irish welcome that is so delightful. All about the house itself are flowers and shrubbery, a great many rose trees, beech trees all over the lawn, which slopes from the house down to a river that runs at the foot of a deep valley. There is a most wonderful kitchen garden, where fruit trees are wonderful kitchen garden, where fruit trees are many, the apple and pear trees laden with blossoms, a quarter of an acre of strawberry beds, while the raspberry and the currant bushes vie in number. All the country through there are beautiful drives, and Mrs, Hungerford is specially fond of driving.

You keep saying over and over again, " It is

You keep saying over and over again, "It is an idyllic home," and it is, my triend. It is the home of a woman who does not dip her sen in acid and write cruelities; instead, it goes into a well of hopeful thoughts, and writes out the pretty tales where true love triumples out the pretty tales where true love triumples here in this, her own home, and all of us are very much inclined to picture what we, ourselves, have experienced. You hid good-bye to "The Duchess" sadly, but you carry away with you the most charming deture imaginable, and you fully realize that as a delightful hostess, a witty writer, a loving mother and wife "time will not wither, nor custom stale her infinite variety;" and in custom stale her infinite variety;" and in your heart you say, "God bless her and hers."

BY ABTHUR HOWARD PICKERING

HE first meeting of Oscar Wilde with the beautiful Miss Lloyd, who afterward became his wife, had in it something of the dramatic. One afternoon while out calling with his mother, Lady Wilde, he was presented to a lovely young girl with whom he talked for some time and in whom he became very much interested, so much so that when leaving the house he turned to his mother and said; "By the by, mamma, I think of marrying that girl."

Lady Wilde laughed, for she was accustomed to her son's eccentricities and sudden fancies,

MKS. WILDE

This fancy, however, was buried deeper than any that had gone before. Oscur Wilde went to America; he lectured, posed, talked and wrote until his name was as familiar in the chief cities of the United States as in England. He returned home, he settled down to steady literary work, and—much to the amazement of Lady Wilde, as well as of his friends—Le married "that girl."

Constance Lloyd was the daughter of Horatlo Lloyd, Queen's Counsel, an English gentleman who had gained a great reputation as a lawyer for a very erudite opinion on cergentleman who had gained a great reputation as a lawyer for a very erudite opinion on cer-tain railway bonds which were ever afterward known as "Lloyd's bonds." Constance was a beautiful girl, with masses of thick wavy chestnut hair, large blue eyes, beautifully penciled eyebrows, a broad forehead and a figure full of grace. In their early married days, when Mr. Wilde was still practicing his days, when Mr. Wilde was still practicing his gospel of the beautiful, and was himself the head and front of the resthetic movement in England, his young wife was a willing and loving disciple, and were the resthetic gowns and artistic colors approved of and designed by her husband. Walter Pater has written nobly on the subject of beauty; but Mr. and Mrs. Wilde were willing in their own persons to present their sermon.

Mrs. Wilde were willing in their own persons to preach their sermon.

The first appearance of Mrs. Wilde in society was a marked success; her youth, her beauty, her freedom from affectation, her lovely estibility gowns, were the talk of the town. Few persons knew how bashful this lovely young girl really was, what an effort she had to make before she entered a drawing-room. Mrs. Wilde often savs now that her first senson, after her marringe, was torture to her; son, after her marriage, was forture to her the constant meeting of new people, the knowledge that she must do her best to make a pleasing impression, hung like a pall over her whenever she left her pretty home. In her own house, on her reception days, it was even worse; and yet she always appeared per-fect mistress of herself and of the occasion, and the very bashfulness from which she suf-fered lent a new and, as it were, a far-off charm to this pretty woman. In her own per-son she furnished an excuse and at the same time a text for her husband's essays on beauty. No one, who saw her in those early days, in her clinging draperies of dull gray or blue, or in her graceful white Grecian gowns, can ever forget the beautiful pictures she presented. Ultra-astheticism in dress having gone out of fashion, and having accomplished its work,

Mrs. Wilde to-day is only resthetic enough to tinge the fashions of the season with her own personality. Her gowns are perfect examples of good taste in fold, harmony and color. She is still so esthetic as to care for the beautiful; but she bends the fashions of the day to her own sweet will instead of clinging to the mediceval forms re-introduced, some years ago, by her husband. Indeed, in no manner is Mrs. Wilde conspicuous to-day, excepting for her beauty and good taste, any more than is her husband, who has returned to the somewhat conventional costume of the latter por-tion of the nineteenth century, and only occasionally belie to make a new color or a flow-tion of the nineteenth century, and only occasionally helps to make a new color or a flower "the rage."

To see Mrs. Wilde at her best, one should visit her at her pretty house in Tite Street, Chelsea. On one side of the hall is Mr. Wilde's
"den," where books, periodicals, manuscripts and flowers are to be found on all sides. The dining-room is at the back, and is a study in ivory white; walls, ceiling, furniture and chima all harmonize. Above stairs is the drawingroom, with its many beautiful panels of stamped Japanese leather, its few perfect specimens of bric-a-brac, its low, comfoctable lounges, its graceful chairs, its pretty tea table with its delicate porcelain and old silver, its artistic etchings, and its full-length portrait of Oscar Wilde in an old-fashioned costume.
Here on Wednesday afternoons during the season, Mrs. Wilde can be found, with her two pretty boys clinging to her gown, dispensing "tea" to her guests and receiving them with gracious hospatality, white her husband assists with his ever-ready fund of witty talk.
There are two children, both boys, Cyril and Vivian. Oscar Wilde laughingly says this modern age by giving them such romantic names; the names of Cyril and Vivian do names; the names of Cyril and Vivian do seem out of place in the money-making, materialistic world of London; but yet it is hardly to be expected that the Wilde boys will ever become business men. With such a father and such a sweet, poetic and lovely mother, it almost goes without saying that the boys must develop into artists of some sort or other. They are attractive boys, with great masses of thick, wavy brown hair, thoughtful blue eyes, and the sturdy strength and rounded limbs of young Greeks.

T is the natural desire of every mother that her son shall be a successful man—prosperous as a man of business, respected by the community in which his fature life may be cast. And who can blame a mother if sometimes—yea, frequently—she expects more of her son than he is capable of realizing for her? A mother's love is deep—deeper, stronger and yet more gentle than any other love ever extended to a man. And is there one among us who is not anxious to realize all the loving expectations centered upon and within us by she who bore us?

A ND yet—and I have reached this conclusion through the scores of letters from mothers which have come to me during the past three years—failure in a young man's life cannot always be attributed to him, but at times to erroneous parental direction. We talk nowadays so much of the education of children that we are apt to forget that there is such a thing as the advention of that there is such a thing as the education of parents that is wanting in some households. There is in England an organization called "The Society for the Education of Parents," and as one reads the proceedings of this body the truth comes home with very strong force that a few branches of such a society might with great benefit be scattered throughout our country. I do not mean to imply by this that there are parents who wilfully misguide their children, but some of the greatest evils we are sometimes done unconsciously. And it is so in many cases that I personally know of, where parents are dwarfing, in a measure, the lives of their sons by unconscious errors; but they are errors just the same, committed though they are through parental love and the mist with which that love sometimes beclouds the eyes of parents. There is such a thing as bringing our children so close to our affections as to leave no room for our judg-ment to act for their best interests. The proper education of a child is that training which tempers love with wisdom. A son may not always choose the path which a parent's love would dictate, but that does not make the choosing the less wise. If the destinies of some of our boys were guided only by that parental love which is not to be bestowed upon an only son, we might well tremble for a por-tion of our future men. The world, unfortunately, does not always agree with a parent as to the empability of a son—and sometimes the world is nearer right than is the parent. To make this point more clear let me illustrate by a quotation from a letter received by me from an affectionate mether only a featurely. from an affectionate mother only a fortnight

THIS mother's letter said to me: "My son A has every taste and tendency toward a physician's cureer, but both his father and myself desire that his life shall be given to the law, just as were the lives of the most success-ful men of both of our families. But des-pite our best efforts, he continues to develop a taste toward the medical profession. Natur-ally we are discouraged." Without applying my remarks to this or any special individual case, it may positively be asserted that there is no greater wrong which a parent cun inflict than to tre and theart the natural tastes and than to try and thwart the natural tastes and desires and tendencies in a growing son. If a boy's thoughts, tastes and studies turn in the direction of medicine, it is a wrong to him, and an injury to his future life, to dissuade him from them and endeavor to train his thoughts into the channels of the law, reference at or any other professional studies. The careers of our most successful men point to one potent fact as a rule, that they adopted the trade or profession for which they could command the greatest and the most natural command the greatest and the most factors interest. A man in an uncongenial occupation never yet made a success, and never will. Where interest is absent, energy and ambition never exist. Let a boy feel a deep interest in his work, and I care not what that work is, he holds in that one element the greatest lever to success. I believe thoroughly in the self-development of a boy's tastes so far as his future occupation is concerned. A in the self-development of a boy's tastes so lar as his future occupation is concerned. A parent can do much toward training that de-velopment, and if taste comes therewith, then the course is clear. But forcing a boy into an occupation for which he has abso-lately no taste, simply because of some family reason, or parental preference, is wrong, and no good can ever come from such a course. The old saw that you can lead a horse to the brook but you cannot make him drink is an apt simile here. apt simile here.

A YOUNG man making a career for him-self nowadays, no matter what profes-sion he may choose, has a hard row to bee at its best. Obstacles are far more numerous in a young man's path than are encouragements. It is anfortunate, but it is true, nevertheless, that there are ten people in this world ready to pull a young man down where there is one to pull a young man down where there is one to belp him up. Competition in all trades and professions is keen; men are alert, and a young man, if he would succeed, cannot afford to lose a single point. Now, in this uneven struggle, if there is one thing the right sort of a young man needs it is home encouragement. In the outer world he is buffeted from post to pillar, and he naturally seeks his home at the close of a day thirsting for that sympathy in his work which he may not have found outside. If, then, at his father's or mother's fire-side, he is continually made to feel that his struggles are distasteful to his closest kin, and is not only made to feel so but is told so, the fight is one which only a few can successfully is not only made to teel so but is told so, the fight is one which only a few can successfully carry to the end. Home love and sympathetic encouragement is the most healing salve for the wounds of the world, for man as well as for boy, and cruel is that paternal doctrine which would withhold it from a son conscien-tiously struggling for success in what he honestly feels to be the work for which he is best admited. best adapted.

VET we can go to the other extreme, and see how a mother's anxious affection can be carried to a point beyond the best interests of a son. It was but a month or so ago that a dear good woman, full of a mother's anxiety, wrote to me and recommed all the efforts she had made in behalf of her son. She had spoken "to all her friends," she wrote, had "secured letters of recommendation from influential people," and she had, to her mind, done all she could to successfully banneh her son into business life. And she had, dear soul! But as I read her letter the thought would continually come to me: "What has this boy done for himself?" Apparently, nothing. Now these are not times when a boy can rest and let his mother or anyone else seek an opening for him. The positions that are worth having are not obtained in this wise. A mother always bases a request for her son upon sentiment, and sentiment is a very poor foundation for any young man upon which to build a business career. A good business man is not apt to place much faith in the progressive spirit of a young man who seeks his confidence through a mother's intercession. A young man, to be successful, must stand by himself and on his own feet, and the heavier he leans on "influence" of any sort the sooner will his leaning-post tumble to pieces.

ND while on this general subject, let me say just one word to those mothers and young men, alike, who are apt to lay so much stress upon "letters of recommendation." There are undoubtedly times and occasions when a letter from just the right hand, ad-dressed to just the right person, presented at just the right moment, and in just the right way, has its value. But, believe me, and in this statement I simply echo the opinions expressed to me by experienced business men, such a combination of time and person is very rare. There is a vast amount of undue impor-tance attached to "influence" in this world as the all-essential toward securing certain privileges and opportunities. been of service to some men, but let one take the trouble to look over the ground to-day and make a few inquiries, and he or she will be surprised how few of the best positions in he business world were obtained through 'influence'' of any sort whatever. The opportunities which mean anything to a young man of to-day are obtained by his own works and his own efforts, and not by the length of the bow of "influence" which he may be able to draw upon them. The keen business man places far more value upon the possibilities in a young man who seeks him on his own assurance than he who hands him a letter

WE have in this country a class of VV mothers delightful in their adherence to olden times, and abhorrent of modern custo olden times, and abborrent of modern cus-tions and tendencies, and in their letters they write: "It is so much more difficult to train a boy now than it was when I was in my father's home. From the moment he goes into the business world he is absorbed in an atmosphere of trickery and dishonest motives which were unknown to us years ago." And then these dear old mothers will tell you how much worse the methods of the last forty years are over those of the preceding two score. Ah, well! it is not strange that we should love best the times which gave us birth, just as no other house, however gorbirth, just as no other house, however gor-geously upholstered, can take the place in our birth, just as no other house, however gorgeously upholstered, can take the place in our affections of the home of our birth, humble though it be. But is it a fact that the methods of training a son are so radically changed? Hardly, I think, save in a general sense. With the progress of years, methods of any sort, whether applied to education, housekeeping, dressmaking, or any other feature of home life, change and broaden. It would be manifestly unjust to surround a boy of the nineteenth century with the restrictions of the Puritan period. Parents can the more safely allow certain well-defined privileges to their children nowadays, because the outer safeguards, created for their protection, are more numerous. But the great cardinal principles upon which a young man's life should be built are precisely the same to-day as they were ages ago. While, as a people, we have progressed, we have not so far progressed, nor can we ever so rapidly progress, as to make inapplicable the great principles of life upon which the world was founded, which have made great men and good women, and propelled the world's greatest enterprises to successful termination.

No matter what else the young man of to-day may be or may not be, he must be as honest, and of as strong principles, as were his father or grandfather before him. No more allowance is made for disbonesty to-day than was made a bundred years ago. The only reason why, in the eyes of older people, dishonesty is more prevalent in 1892 than it was in 1892, is because the world has grown larger, not because the people of the present year love or countenance dishonesty the more. To say that there is more dishonesty practiced To say that there is more dishonesty practiced in business to-day than there was forty, fifty, or eighty years ago, finds its strongest refutation in the fact that commercial interests point to but one condition, and that is progress in every direction, and progress and dishonesty never go hand in hand. A young man of dishonest tendencies, or who allows himself to "blink" at dealings which he knows to be "shady," is as certain of ultimate failure to day as he was a hundred years ago. The rope at which he clings may be a little longer than it was some time ago, but the end is there just the same, and the fall will be just as great. I do not think our mothers need to teach their soms so much the value of honesty in matters which are manifestly dishonest, because pure and unadulterated dishonest, because pure and unadulterated dishonesty always warms more than it invites. The great lesson to be taught to the young man of to-day is the full meaning of that honesty which will teach him to recognize dishonesty clothed in the garb of honesty, and then shun it. A thief is never made in a day; the beginning is generally found at a point which was not recognized as dishonesty, simply because it was shrewdly hidden. It is this "blinking" at dishonesty, this playing with honesty, that is ruinous to most young men—this engaging in things which are just a trifle "shady," and which the public does not even associate with the real article for a time. It is dishonesty just the same, only it is called by another name—"shrewdness" as a rule. This form of dishonesty has, perhaps, increased, as it is bound to increase with times tuned to such a high tension as ours, when men's honest wits are taxed to their utmost or eighty years ago, finds its strongest refu-tation in the fact that commercial interests creased, as it is bound to increase with times tuned to such a high tension as ours, when men's honest wits are taxed to their utmost and finally overtaxed. But a young man, carving out the way for himself, cannot afford to "blink" at dishonesty and allow it to go on identified with his interests, simply because it is not apparent to the naked eye, any more than be can afford to openly steat. Dishonesty is dishonesty, even if it is so small that it can only be seen through a powerful telescope.

L AST evening I was talking to a man of years and wisdom, who has accumulated a fortune from his business experience; a man whose name is at the head of one of the greatest commercial houses in New York, and, having these editorial comments in mind, I said to him:

To what trait in a boy's character, which will be of most value to him in after life, do you believe a mother should pay the most attention?

Honesty, first," said this millionaire merchant; "then, thoroughness,"

And the more one thinks of this simple tatement, the more fraught with wisdom will statement, the more traught with wisdom will it be found to contain.

The great value of thoroughness is under-stood and appreciated by just about one or two young men out of every ten in business life to-day. The tendency with the average young man is to "rush" things, to get a thing through, no matter how it is done. It is the end he seeks, forgetting that some people are apt to examine into the means by which some ends are attained. It is not at all surprising to me why some young men do not succeed in business when I see the methods they in business when I see the methods they adopt to attain success. They want to succeed, but they do not want to do the work necessary for success. They want large salaries, good positions, but short hours and little to do, and even that little they will not do well. If there are two Americanisms that have wrought more evil than any other, I think it is the one of "Oh, it is good enough!" and the other of "I will do." when a thing is about ball or three-noughrees done. a thing is about balf or three-quarters done.

To do a thing quickly is the only thought of hundreds of our young men in the offices to-day; to do it well and thoroughly rarely enters into their heads. The office boy believes he will commend himself to his employer by "copying" twenty letters in five min-utes in the "letter press," but the accomplish-ment of speed is far clearer to that boy's mind than are the impressions of the letters in the ment of speed is far clearer to that boy's mind than are the impressions of the letters in the book to the employer some days after. The young man who clerks prides himself upon his ability to answer all the morning's mail before the noon hour of each day. He does it, but how? Abbreviations are as plentiful as words in that clerk's letters, until, as a possible record, the communication is utterly valueless, minus, as it frequently is, of either date, or name of addressee. I have absolutely no patience with that haste, unfortunately so common in business, which omits the "Mr." or "Esquire" from a business letter, the year from a date line, which brings "Gentlemen" to "Gent'n" or "Dear Sir," to "Dr Sir," "Yours Respectfully," to "Y'rs Resp'y," or offends good taste by the hasty abbreviations of such a name as "Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes," on the envelope of a letter to "O. W. Holmes," of "George William Cartis, Esquire," to "G.W. Curtis," or the proper prescription of "Philadelphia, Penn'a, "to "Phila, Pa." And yet these are the ideas of "rushing" business which prevail in the minds of scores of young men. Rapid work is never creditable where it is but half done. Far more apt is it to act just the reverse than the worker imagines; and the young man whose only recommendation is that he is able to get through with "a pile of work," by the methods I have outlined, has in him the making of a very poor business man. The successful business men are most careful about smalle things, and they often look for the smaller traits in their clerks in forming opinious of their characters.

N OT that I would wish any young man to be a "plodder," or to be so mindful of small things that he has no energy or comprehension of the larger ones. The business world of to-day has no room for plodders, nor for men of small minds. The best success is that obtained on broad principles by men capable of sweeping the entire horizon with one glance. But thoroughness applies to the largest enterprises as well as to the amullest purious derail. But thoroughness applies to the largest enter-prises as well as to the smallest routine detail of office work. Slip-shod methods are never identified with success; patience, perseverance and thoroughness are the levers of business progress. "Rushing" a thing never pays. We regard men of quick or early successes some-times, and say that "he rushed into success," when the fact is, that no man ever rushed into a success that is a success. Behind every suc-cessful cureer is always found work, and lard work, work born of accuracy and thorough-ness. However much to the public the suc-cessful man may sometimes seem to have been cessful man may sometimes seem to have been mude in a day, there is always a story to every chapters than to another, but the story as a whole is always the same, and two chapters one is pretty apt to find in the book of every successful life are headed "Honesty" and "Thoroughness."

A MOTHER who now sends out a son into the business world launches him at a time when the chances are all in favor of a young man. Business men were never more willing to place large trusts upon the shoulders of young men than they are to-day. "Young blood," as it is called, is the life of the modern blood," as it is called, is the life of the modern business world, and is everywhere sought. In New York the demand for the right kind of young men in all capacities is far greater than the supply, and what is true of New York is true of all the large cities. Bear in mind, however, I say the right kind of young men, and by that classification I mean young men who are willing to work, and work hard. The who are willing to work, and work hard. The day of the young man who works by the clock, eagerly watching for the hour when the office shall close, has gone by, even if it ever existed. Hundreds of young men are ener-getic in a new position until its novelty wears off and then become mere machines whose places can be filled at a day's notice.

N 0 mother need have undue anxiety for the success of a son who this autumn or winter steps out into the business world so long as he bears in mind a few essential points.

He must be honest above all things, and allow nothing to convince him that there is a compromise between honesty and dishonesty. He must be an out and out believer in the homely but forcible saying that a man cannot drink whisky and be in business. He must, too, decide between being a society man or a business man: he cannot be both. He must make his life outside the office the same as in it, and not be possessed with the prevalent idea that his employer has no busioffice hours. An employer has revery right to expect his employer bas every right to expect his employes to be respectable at all times, in the office or out of it.

He must respect other people's opinions, always remembering that a young man, of all human below, has rough to bear.

human beings, has much to learn. He must learn, if he would be wise, never to argue on two questions-politics and re-

And he must never forget that, being born woman, he owes an obligation to mother's sex which, as a loyal son and a gentleman, forbids him from listening, without pro-test, to offensive stories in which she is concerned. A young man cannot listen to some of the stories which a certain class of men are fond of telling without offending his mother, his sister, or the girl who a little later will teach him through her own sweet life that whatever is said to the moral detriment of her sex is a lie and a reflection upon the two women who, one at the beginning of his life and the other at its ending, will prove his best bis track, his ogle most loving friends—his mother and his wife.

CTOBER comes in royal guise, the misty haze on the hill-top lies, her gold and crimson banner flies, her dreamy spell has bound us; blue skies bend o'er the gleaming wood, and though the tribes are gone for good, we feel a certain likelihood of Indian summer round us. The birds, in many a recties throng, their last "farewell forever" song reent again and still prolong the moment pent again and still protong the moment of their going, to sing again once more their summer tunes of dewy morns and drowsy noons, of fragrant fields and rosy Junes, when apple boughs were snowing. White-handed children, sweet and fair, leave home at morn to wander where October's treasures here and there the not stream ways have scattered, and to wander where October's treasures here and there the nut-strewn ways have scattered, and in the evening's soft half-light creep slowly home in doleful plight, with face, hands and raiment, shocking sight, with walnut stain bespatered. Like autumn locusts, for and high, the coal chute's strident voice moants high, the price soars upward to the sky, but goes without the dealer. The last lone "skeeter" lingering, still his maw with human gore to fill, is slapped to rest with vengeful skill by some unfeeling feeler. All up and down the noisy street the patriot men with marching feet turn out in thousands strong to greet the leaders of the nation; with voices hourse as cawing jays they shrick wild strains hoarse as cawing jays they shrick wild strains of campaign lays, and roar their kip-hip-hip-hoo-rays in howling jubilation. And all these trifles indicate what trusty diaries plainly state, that in her gorgeous robes elate and in her russet sober, with joyous hopes, with memories sad, with partings dreary, meetings glad, for west or woe, for good or bad, the year has reached October.

THE DESERTER OF THE HOME

BUT there is one bright vision that has But there is one bright vision that has baunted you at times during the summer with restless forebodings, and with hope that spake the word of promise to the car in June only to break it to the kitchen in October. One bright and joyous feature of the home circle at the time of its reunion does not materialise. Eller Eller the homeometers not materialize. Ellen Eliza, the hammerer of china, does not return when the awallowers homeward fly. Slow dawns the reluctant day, although it always gets up on time, however slow it may seem to our impatience, and wearily drag the hours along to sunset, but wearily drug the hours along to sunset, but never the voice of her song comes wailing up the stairs in many a varied key of cheery shrillness, to mingle with the morning orisons of the fandly as they say their prayers before beginning their daily equabbles. No welcome brother comes, nor primes the more convenient cousin bearing her green box to the door to say that she will follow hard upon his coming. say that she will follow hard upon his coming.

A weary search among her relatives in Legion county reveals the depressing, disheartening truth that Eilen Eliza has basely deserted you. And for what? This is the blow that breaks you down; this is the stab of Brutus. This, as you have heard Professor Prewnsanprisms say, is the ingratchichewed that wrecks your forchichewed.

INSULT UPON INJURY

SHE has accepted a position in a rag warehouse, a place where all her work is of the dust, dusty; a place which, in the heated, but usually accurate imagination of the American housekeeper, is fraught with all contagion from all the quarantines of recking ports; from all the lazarettos of tropical islands of the multitudinous seas; from all pest houses and all plague hospitals under all burning suns. It is a favorite and widespread fiction—nay, I will not say fiction—I say, though you should try to drag the misleading and libelous word from my tongue with redand libelous word from my tongue with redhot pincers and teams of borses, I say, I will not say fiction; I will say conviction; faith, positive knowledge, that's what I will say of the American housekeeper, that dealers in rags, proprietors of paper mills, manufacturers of fine lines of stationery, will search the world over and pay fabulous prices to agents and commissioners to secure for their trade, rags from pestilential lands and plague-swept dis-Nay, have we not reason to know, can we not prove, were it not that proof is fur less convincing than conviction, that where the paper manufacturer hears of the cholera there with all speed he sends his trusty and confidential buyer; when the fatal message thrills the cable with the black news that yellow fever rages in a foreign land, he straight suborns consular agents and resident mor-chants to secure for him the coveted deal in rags; and when he hears that the dreaded black death is slaying its tens of thousands he hastily packs his value, kisses his wife and babies, and saying that he can trust no one but himself to secure the rags of these favored actions allowed to the bountage land of plants. patients, flies to the bounteous land of plenty, est some commercial rival more active than himself shall secure the coveted prize. Do we not know full well what is an American rag warehouse? Proofs? We need no proofs; we know it. It has always been so; it was so when Adam was a tallor and Eve made her own dresses. You ask any housekeeper, if you don't want to believe me.

LOOK ON THIS PICTURE

A ND it is for such a place as this that A. Ellen Eliza has left your home. Your home! Think of that. This is a wound that "smarts to be remembered." This would humble you down to the dust if it didn't make you too mad to speak. Why, look at it.

On this side your home, in soft back ground and fair middle tints; your home, that is envied, most lovingly covered, by the friends who are favored to frequent it. A palace in miniature: a dream of perfect taste, of elegant miniature; a dream of perfect taste, of elegant refinement; its very atmosphere is a perfume of well-ordered neatness. Your husband, a man among a thousand, educated, distinguished in well-ordered neatness. Your husband, a man among a thousand, educated, distinguished in the little circle that is honored by his presence and condescension—truly, heaven was good to send you such a man; he was the lust one of that lot; he was a bargain, he was. And your children, those wingless cherubs; ah, the darlings, how can any one look at them and keep the tears back from their eyes? They are beautiful indeed, and as good as they are fair. And one must say this for you because your sweet humility will not permit you to say it yourself. So gracious are you, and so easy with your "help." Your kitchen is a real parior; your work arranged with special regard to the servant's comfort; everything about the kitchen arranged to the Queen's taste, Eilen Eliza, the XLVIII; her own room, airy, cool, even dainty, a gem of comfort and neutness; and then your light service, your easy requirements, your generous thoughtfulness for your servant's needs; company allowed every Thursday evening—one whole evening in the week when she may converse and hold social intercourse with others of her kind and station; the long evening to begin after work is done and close at ten o'clock; a holiday every month and every other Sunday afternoon if she will return in time to prepare the evening meal. Such a home as that is offered to very few "girls," let me tell you. Surely Eliza must have lost her senses to have given up such comforts as your house afforded her.

THEN ON THAT

Then on that

A ND on the other hand, what? Behold the place to which Ellen Eliza has gone from your home. A rag warehouse; nasty, dusty, dirty, disease y, smelly—pah! "Look on this picture, then on that!" Hyperion to a satyr; Ariel to Caliban; Paradise to Purgatory. Ellen Eliza, where are you? Where do you stand? Ah, you are looking too high, dear madam; you will never see Ellen Eliza if you keep on straining your neck looking up toward the clonds. It is quite natural that you should think, in fact, that you should know—it is much the same thing, under ordinary circumstances, but sometimes it is different—that when your lovely home and charming family are placed in one plate of scales and the rag warehouse in the other, that there could be but one result. I know; but sometimes it is the other one. Didn't you feel something kind of bounce when Elien Eliza stepped on the scales? Yes; well, that was your charming family, and your distinguished husband, and your lovely home, and your own crowning self kicking the beam. Here, away down here—can you see them?—as far down as the counter will let them go, is Ellen Eliza and the mg warehouse. There she is, where all her work is of the rag, raggy, but where it begins at seven A. M., when the whistle blows, and ends at six P. M., when it blows again, with an hour at noon; where she has every evening in the week, all the blows again, with an hour at noon; where she has every evening in the week, all the company she wants and as long as she wants it; fifty-two Sundays in the year all for her own self, to pass as her inclination and con-science may suggest; regular hours and all the legal holidays without asking anybody, just the same as the men, for all the world just like the men! False Ellen Eliza, this is worse, this is more basely ungrateful, this is more this is more basely ungrateful, this is more preposterously unheard of than getting mar-ried! And that is a crime in a good "do-mestic." Why is it? Why, because it is. You ask any housekeeper; she knows.

LO HERE! LO THERE

FOLLOWS then an interim of experimental work with Ellen Eliza XLIVth to LXIVth, a time of wenriness of the flesh and vexation of spirit. It leaves your wearied body and bewildered brain in the whirlpool of the wearland amount on which has versied the unsolved question which has worried womankind ever since Hagar, the handmaid, ran away from Sarai, the mistress, nearly 4,000 years ago somehow preferring the desolation of the wilderness of Shur to doing general housework in a small family with no children. You are worn out in a struggle with handfire, wind a clock or propel a sweeper; with cooks who cannot cook and who are firmly convinced that man was made to live firmly convinced that man was made to live upon baker's bread served stale and canned ments served cold. Some go far enough and stay long enough to cast a glance of scora at the room where they are expected to sleep, and retire without a word. Others give one crushing look at your charming family and fly back to the intelligence office, and some, still more considerate, remain in your household long enough to break what few bits of fragile ware Ellen Eliza the preceding may have thoughtlessly overlooked. THE MAN TO THE RESCUE

The Man to the Rescue

Not many days of this suffices to worry, or I would not say worry, nor yet irritate, because that most excellent man, who is the light and life of the circle which is distinguished and honored by his gracious presence, is not irritable—but he begins to develop symptoms of melancholy; he becomes penaive like; there is a pathetic intonation in his voice; he—he kind of, oh, well, what he says is this: "Good land! What is this place? Castle Garden? Are you running an Immagnation Bureau in the kitchen? I can use in six months, and if a woman wants to hire one girl she makes more fies than the Homestead strike, and then doesn't do anything. Here; ginune the address of that intelligence office and I'll bring you home a girl." You meekly remind him that he mustn't call it an intelligence office, but Mutual Domestic Service Bureau. remind him that he mustn't call it an intelligence office, but Mutual Domestic Service Bureat. "'Tis, key?" he says, with bitter scorn.
"I'll take some of the starch out of 'em. They won't have any woman to fool with when I get hold of 'em." He pauses on the doorstep to say: "I'll leave the office early to-day, and will be home about half-past four. I'll bring a cook and a second girl with me, Hear?" And he walks away with the haughty air of a business man who daily roars at an office boy, scolds a typewriter, and builties a book-keeper, to say nothing of firing a porter every time be gets real mad.

THE EAGLE IN THE DOVE COTE

THE EAGLE IN THE DOVE COTE

If If in the air is his imperial head as he stalks away, lofty is his commanding glance as he enters his office, a Guiliver among the Lilliputians. Hard lines for the type-writer that day, for he is bitter against her sex, and he'll show her. Woe is her if in swift dictation she spells Caspar Jodel's name with a Y, "Wah! don't you know anythink? Ginsme that letter! Here! I can write it in half the time you can take it." All the long morning he keeps up his rage and dignity and peremptoriness against the Mutual Domestic Service Bureau by practising upon her. Oft she retoriness against the Mutual Domestic Service Bureau by practising upon her. Oft she retires behind the copy sheet, sometimes to weep, anon to make faces at him. The book-keeper gets so nervous—"rattled" he tells the shipping clerk—by ten o'clock that he can't add up a column of figures in one syllable. The office boy, with the caution and instinct of his kind, keeps out of the way when he isn't wanted, and receives his orders at long range when he is summoned, relieving his feelings by vigorous pantomime in the hall, as oft as he gets rouded out of the office, and the unfortunate norter is discharged every time he oft as he gets roaded out of the office, and the unfortmente porter is discharged every time he comes in sight, but he is used to it. When that man at last sets out, with a high head and a defiant heart for the Mutual Domestic Service Bureau, it is the destroying march of Attilla. Weep, oh maids of the many colored rainment; lift up the voice and howl in the faucied security of that little back room where ye hold awful and mysterious court, for the Arenger of Man is on your track! Lo, where he comes, the air smokes and the ground is black.

THE LAMB AMONG WOLVES

If Emters the precints of the bureau, Black is his brow, and rasping with an wouted barshness is his voice. Sternly he bends his gaze upon the superintendent. She lifts her own eyes a passing moment to meet his feroclous expression, tranquilly, as one who had been weaned in early infancy on just such glances from much larger men. She resumes her writing. There is something in the atmosphere of this strange place that chills him. He snorts "Goodaftnoon!" in one word, and in the same tone in which he had snarled "Gmorn!" to his typewriter. The superintendent looks up pleasantly and says: "Good afternoon, sir," with excessive courtesy and just a little Boston icing on it. He breaks into a cold perspiration as the horrible thought sweeps across his mind that she may have followed him there to witness the battle. He looks over his shoulder as a murderer might look around at the ghost. He would give a dollar if the office boy would just come after him with a message. He knocks his head off. His tougue cleaves to the sun-burned roof of his kiln-dried mouth. He takes off his hat, He prefers a request for an interview with a lady who might be willing to necept a situation to assist in general bousework. The lady is presented. "An' how many hav yez in the family?" "Five." He is alone. He hears an unfamiliar voice beyond the partition saying, as to an audience: "Thayre's a house full o' thim." He suggests, in a house, strange voice, that he will try for two. They are summoned. The candidate for cook is taller than himself; the "sicking gyuri" de-THE LAMB AMONG WOLVES H E enters the precints of the bureau, Black strange voice, that he will try for two. They are summoned. The candidate for cook is taller than himself; the "sicking gyur!" demands of him where he lives. He names the street. The two ladies turn to look into each other's faces; two harsh and hollow bursts of laughter grate upon the startled air; two faces look down upon him with pitying commiseration, and he is once more alone. He was void like a man walking in his steep. asseration, and he is once more alone. He goes out like a man walking in his sleep. He falls over a dog and "begs pardon." He meets the office boy and lifts his hat to that astonished young rebel. He sees his typewriter waiting for a car, and calls a hanson for her. He reaches home and when the "ad interim." Ellen Eliza opens the door, he calls her "Madam," and apologics for troubling her. You say: "Where is the new girt?" He says: "Oh? Didn't have time to go for her." her. You say: "Where is the new girl?" He says: 'Oh? Didn't have time to go for her."
And he is correct. She went for him. After this, perhaps, you had better not say anything to him about it.

Oh, patient, much-enduring, long-suffering woman, no man living knows upon what heart-aches and trials and tribulations of the heart-aches and trials and trousantons of the flesh and the spirit his happy home is founded. If he did he couldn't sleep in it. Sometimes he can't anyhow, but that isn't what keeps him awake. It's one thing and another,

All such should be addressed direct to the headquarters of the Order, 158 West Twenty-third Street, New York city, and prompt attention will be given.

HEART TO HEART TALKS

HIS is an anniversary month with me. Two years ago this month since I entered THE LADIES' HOME JOUR-NAL. Two such rich years in the love and years in the love and appreciation of so many women. I wish I had been a better conductor of the love clearly to see the King. My joy has been, in the words of Lucy Larcom;

'The best that any mortal bath Is that which every mortal shares."

The best I have is in the idea of the Order of which we are sisters; that God is the Father of us all; we share His love; He is our Father. Then we have our Lord Jesus Christ. He belongs to all, though all do not equally know Him. Some do not know Him at all, but is it not our one work by some means, by any means, to make Him known to them? Nothing is sadder to me than to see so many who do not know their own Father, but my joy is that He is their Father, and to be in the least a help to this recognition is why I consented to enter the door that was opened for me in this Journal two years ago. I knew how incompetent I was, but that must never prevent us from attempting to do what is offered us. If I had declined because I felt I was not fitted for the place I should not have the joy of knowing you; we learn to do by doing. I fear that some are missing raths of medianes. The best I have is in the idea of the Order of for the place I should not have the joy of knowing you; we learn to do by doing. I fear that some are missing paths of usefulness by looking at the great things that others do, and maybe there is a little pride in not being willing to do what we can, instead of what we would like to do.

MY FIRST APPEARANCE IN PRINT

MY FIRST APPEARANCE IN PRINT

I WELL remember the first little thing I sent to a paper. I had a motive for writing, and that was clear, and my ambition was bounded. I thought I might take up a few lines in a paper giving a truth in an illustration, and if it had a taking heading, some woman lying on a sofa because she had not strength to sit up, unable to read a long, clever article, might read something very short that attracted her attention. I well remember I did not want to take up much room in the paper (a laudable ambition, I have no doubt some editors will say). I never dreamed of receiving a penny for it, and I shall never forget that first small sum that came to me saying they were not in the habit of paying, but my thoughts were suggestive. Why do I write this? Only to beg of you to do the little you can do and leave the rest to Him. I see so many women who, if they had been willing to use the one talent instead of envying those who had five, might have done much, but, "I have no talent," they say. You never know whether you have or not till you try. On the other hand there are many women who feel they could do if they only had the chance. Well, be hopeful; you will yet have a chance; that is my hope. God will give you a chance sometime, somewhere. And now what shall I say to you—what word shall I give you as we enter on the third year of our friendship for each other? What word for the desponding, almost despairing, and the glad ones as well as the sad ones? I think nothing could be better than this, Hope thou in God and wait patiently for Him.

AN EVERGREEN CEDAR TREE

AN EVERGREEN CEDAR TREE

SUCH new joys come to me these days that I think I must tell you about them, for I want the autumn time of your life to be as rich as mine. One young girl, a member of our Circle, writes me, "At our school, Arbor Day, we planted a tree, an evergreen cedar, and called it Margaret Bottome, so you are seen and loved way down here" (Maryland), and adds, "Can you let me know by some word in the Journat if you have room in your Circle for me?" Yes, I have room for all who wish to come; our Circle cannot be too large. When I read of the evergreen bearing my name it read of the evergreen bearing my name it took me back to two evergreens that were my especial joy in the winter time when I lived in a double house in the country, and a large evergreen was an either side of the front stoop. After all my flowers were gone, and the winter snow came, still my trees were green, and they looked so beautiful with the snow upon them; and then they became my teachers, as many other trees and flowers have been, but the lesson my evergreens taught me was what God said to His ancient people, "I am like a green fir tree—from Me is thy fruit found." God is the true evergreen; when all the flowers of life may be gone and no greenness left, He is still our evergreen. our evergreen.

IN MEMORY OF OUR DEAR ONES

A T the same time that this pleasure came to me there came a letter from India from a little girl bearing my name whom a Circle of the King's Daughters are supporting and educating. The letter from this little dark Indian girl moved me strangely. Maybe you would like to see it, so I copy it for you.

"Mt Dear Mamma:—"I am trying to be a good child. Whenever I pray I pray for you. I am anxious to see you. With love and kisses from your affectionate daughter, kisses from your affectionate daughter,
"Margarer Bottome."

"MARGARET BOTTOME."

A strange joy came over me as I thought of a little child of nine years in far off India praying for me by name. Would not some one else beside me like to have a new joy like this? I once had a little girl named for my own Mamie, who left me when three years old for the better land, and it seemed to me the sweetest thing I could do in memory of her. Only think how lovely to remember our own dear mothers and children in some such way. I was in a room a few weeks ago in a hospital where a mother had endowed a bed, and the room borethe name of her darling little boy and his picture was in different places in the room where any poor little boy that had the disease of which he died could be cared for lovingly, and I fancied the dear child (whose portrait hung where the little sufferer could see it) was so glad that, though gone from earth, he could still relieve suffering and do a life work. O, there are so many ways of doing good! Speaking of memorials, I remember after talking one evening to the "Daughters" somewhere, a lady came up and asked me if the Order was unsectarian, for if so they would, as children of their dear mother who had recently left them, like to form a Circle and call it the "Olive Branches" (their mother's name was Olive), a family Circle of Friends. She said it would be in her memory. There are memorials in a suffering world like ours better than coid stone, but let us get memorials in the hearts of others while living, so that after we have gone from earth we shall still live on in the hearts of others while living, so that after we have gone from earth we shall still live on in the hearts of others while living, so that after we have gone from earth we shall still live on in the hearts of those to whom we may have been interpreters of the love of the "Everlasting Father."

The Laurel at the Top Of the Hill.

THE LAUREL AT THE TOP OF THE HILL

THE LAUREL AT THE TOP OF THE HILL

I WAS taking a drive to gather the beautiful laurel, last summer, when one at my side said: "Do you know what a hill we have come up?" I said "Yes," and then he added, "But there's plenty of laurel at the top of the hill." In that moment I seemed to see the long, steep hill of life, and the plenty of laurel at the top of the hill had a pleasant sound to me. The laurel also suggested victory to me, and I was glad there was a top to every hill and that there was something at the top of the hill for us. A few moments after the words "There's plenty of laurel at the top of the hill "were uttered I had my arms full of the beautiful flowers. Perhaps we do not think how our spiritual muscles are being strengthened in the long pull up the hill. One thing I am sure of, we are not anticipating as we might what awaits us at the top. The early church, we read, took joyfully the spoiling of their goods, but you get the secret of their joy in the words that followed, "Knowing that in heaven they had a better and an enduring substance," and no one can read the life of the early disciples without being impressed with their anticipations of what awaited them at the top of the hill. They were not going up that steep hill for nothing. Heaven was at the top. And of Moses it was said he had respect to the recompense of the reward, so be endured as seeing him that is invisible. We seem to be enduring without seeing the invisible; without thinking of what awaits us.

I went up that hill for laurel, and we must go up every hill of difficulty for something and take all the painful as well as the sweet as means to an end—never the end. I WAS taking a drive to gather the beautiful as means to an end—never the end.

MEANS TO AN END To get at the meaning of things is to have life's victory. Do you think the monotonous life that some of you are living is going to last? Not at all. Do you think you are going to be on that farm forever? behind that counter forever? Not at all. All that is most to an extended that is means to an end. And on the other hand you who have everything that life can give, look out! It is only means to an end. Your loved ones are around you. Remember your beautiful children are immortal, and if you do not keep this in mind, when the little darlings were those wices are get their wings you may be plunged into a depth you need not have gone into if you had only recognized the immortal life of the child while yet with you. We called a little girl once, "Our sweet little angel without any wings," but one day the wings came, and she went to a far more beautiful clime than this,

HELPING OTHERS UP

BUT she was made for wings. She was made D for the country where she lives to-day. Would it not be well for us to see, to realize, would it not be well for us to see, to realize, that this life is going up hill, and that the laurel is at the top, and then if some get through the climbing before we do we shall be glad for them, though we shall sorely miss them as we go up the hill without them. I have known those who were going up the hill of life together, so companionable that those who looked at them trembled when they thought what the result would be if each those who looked at them trembled when they thought what the result would be if one should go before the other, and I have seen them separated and then—a wonder. The one that was left to go up the hill alone went on so firmly and so hopefully that the way could not be long and so glad for the loved one whose feet were tired and was now resting. Then instead of being selfish and not carring for other travelers, now that the one they loved best was out of sight, they turned and helped others up the hill as they never had before.

I knew of two lovers (husband and wife)

I knew of two lovers (husband and wife) and we could not insagine them without one another. But one day as they were walking up the hill together he said to his wife, "If I up the hill together he said to his wife, "If I get to the top before you do you will try to finish my work as well as your own, won't you?" and she said she would; and he promised if she went first he would carry out her plans. He reached the top first, and for years she has been going on helping so many travelers on the upward path. But it takes a spiritual life, a recognition of a life beside this life of the senses lived here, to see the eternal things. Shall we not keep the top of the hill in mind?

THE VALUE OF SCRAPS

THE VALUE OF SCRAPS

I ONCE visited the Birmingham Brass Factory, and the first thing that attracted my attention was a large pile of bits of metal. I said to the superintendent, who was to show us through: "What is that?" and he answered, "Scrape," I did not know then that these scraps were to pass through so many processes and come out at last the useful and beautiful things they were intended to be. But oh, the furnaces, the poundings, the acids, the almost everything it seemed to me they had to endure. And then huge blocks of brass—they were put through so many processes to get the fine golden wire at the last. After one room after another had been passed through the superintendent said, "You must see the completing room." The word had a pleasant sound, and I went up to the floor above to see the completing room. As soon as I entered I was struck with the difference from the other rooms; there was less noise. All the machinery was moved by foot, and somehow I wondered whether, in the completion of character, there was not less noise and more of the going about doing good—a sort of ministry on foot. Everything I saw gave me hope for humanity, the beneficence of the fires, all were needed to bring to perfection, and it seemed to me I should never see the scraps of humanity again but I would think that though the scraps would pass through much that was, painful, yet the One who knew all, Who the scraps would pass through much that was, painful, yet the One who knew all. Who superintended all, would bring them to the end for which they were made.

As I passed from one part of the factory to the other, through the windows and through the open doors I could see the beautiful Housathe open above I count see the benutiful House, tonic, the calm, pure stream that was the power of all that was being brought to perfec-tion in the brass mill. And the power was so quiet. Again and again with the roar of the machinery in my ears I would glance out at the pure river, and the old familiar lines stole in so peacefully.

" Round our restlessness His rest."

THE INDICATOR OF DANGER

OTHING in the brass factory impressed NOTHING in the brass factory impressed me more than the stopping of the big wheel. In an instant a number of men were on the spot. I saw the superintendent turn his head to look at something and I inquired what the difficulty was. He said the indicator had not been watched closely, and the load was beyond the water power. In that moment I seemed to see the overloaded brains, the overloaded bodies of so many, and the consequence will be in the case of these overloaded people, the wheel will suddenly ston! londed people, the wheel will suddenly stop! And then I wondered whether those who will And then I wondered whether those who will sadly miss the wheel when it stops are marking the indications of overwork. "Look out for your machinery." I did not notice how many small wheels stopped until the pressure was removed and the big wheel started again, and then I thought of a father of a large family of children who did not mark the indications of the overworked machinery and cations of the overworked machinery, and one day the wheel stopped and it could not be started again. And what a difference it made to the little wheels. The oldest boy never went to college as his father intended he went to coises as his rather intended he should. Some of the girls did not graduate at the school of learning where they were when their father died. Oh, what a difference it makes in a family when either of the big wheels, father or mother, come to a stop.

The truth is often about four tends and the stops.

The truth is often absent from tombetones, or we should often see "Died from over-work." Alsa for the women who have no tender husbands to say, as some tender husbands say, "You are overworking, my little woman. You must have more help." And well for the near who have were thousands. woman. You must have more help. And well for the men who have wise, thoughtful wives, who have enough influence with their husbands to get them to stop overloading the machinery until it is too late.

By Rev. T. De Will Talmage, D.D.

E Republicans and Demo-crats in America have been brought up on the theory that the aristocracy of Great Britain lives a fictitious and stilted life in aim. My own ideas on the subject have been reconstructed by have been reconstructed by my present visit. There are in the world three kinds of aristocracy; the aristocracy of wealth, the aristocracy of birth and the aristocracy of goodness. The last will yet come to the ascendancy, and men will be judged not according to the number of dollars they have gathered nov the fame of their ancestors. But if I must choose between the aristocracy of wealth and the aristocracy of wealth and the aristocracy of birth. I choose the latter. I find that those who have been born to high position wear their honors with more case and less ostentation than those who come suddenly upon distinguished place.

THE ARISTOCRACY OF ENGLAND

THE ARISTOCRACY OF ENGLAND

Of far as I have this summer seen the homes and habits of the aristocrats of England, I find them plain in their manners, highly cuitured as to their minds, and many of them intensely Christian in their feelings. There is more strut and pretention of manner in many an American constable, or alderman, or legislator, than you will find in the halls and castles of the nobility of England. One great reason for this is that a man born to great position in Great Britain is not afraid of losing it. He got it from his father, and his father from his grandfather, and after the present occupant is done with the estate, his child will get it and then his grandchild, and so on perpetually. It is the man who has child will get it and then his grandchild, and so on perpetually. It is the man who has had distinguished piace for only two or three years, and may lose it to-morrow, who is especially anxious to impress you with his exaitation. His reign is so short he wants to make the most of it. Even the men who come up from the masses in England to political power are more likely to keep it than in America, for the member of the House of Commons may represent any part of England that desires to compliment his services instead of being compelled to contest with twenty small men in his own district, as in America.

* UNOSTENTATION OF TITLED PEOPLE

THIS unostentation seen among those who have done their own climbing is true, also, of those who are at the top without climbing at all. The Marquis of Townshend, who once presided at my lecture at the Crystal Palace, had the simplicity of a child, and mastice, him among other men you would tal Palace, had the simplicity of a child, and meeting him among other men you would not suspect either his wealth or his bonors. The Earl of Shaftesbury is like a good old grandfather from whom it requires no art to evoke either a tear or a laugh. The family of Lord Cairns, the highest legal authority in England, is like any other Christian home which has high art and culture to adorn it. Among the pleasantest and most unaffected of people are duchesses and "right honorable" ladies. The most completely gospelized man I ever met was the Earl of Kintore, since de-I ever met was the Earl of Kintore, since de-ceased. Seated at his table some years ago, he said: "Do not forget our journey next Sab-bath night." It was useless to tell me not to forget that which I had so ardently anticipated. At six o'clock his lordship called at the hotel, not with carriage, for we were going where it was best for us to go afoot. With his servant to carry his cont and Bible and pealm book we sauntered forth. We were out to see some of the evening and midnight charities of Lon-don. First of all we went into the charit-lodging houses of London, the places where outcast men, who would otherwise have to lodging houses of London, the pisces where outcast men, who would otherwise have to lodge on the banks of the Thames, or under the arch bridges, may come in and find gratuitous shelter. These men, as we went in, sat around in all stages of poverty and wretchedness. As soon as the Earl entered they all knew him. With some he shook hands, which in some cases was a big undertaking. It is pleasant to shake hands with the clean, but a trial to shake hands with the clean, but a Kintore did not stop to see whether these men had attended to proper abtutions. They were in sin and trouble, and needed belp, and that was enough to enlist all his sympathies. He in sin and trouble, and needed belo, and that was enough to enlist all his sympathies. He addressed them as "gentlemen" in a short, religious address, and promised them a treat "about Christenas," telling them how many pounds he would send: and accommodating himself to their capacity, he said: "It would be a regular blow-out." He told me that he had no faith in trying to do their souls good unless he sympathized practically with their physical necessities.

From this charity lodging house, which the physical necessities.

From this charity lodging house, which the inmates call the "House of Lords," we went to one of the inferior quality, which the inmates call the "House of Commons." There were different grades of squalor, different degrees of rags. From there we went to missions, and out-door meetings, and benevotent rooms, where coffee and chocolate were crowding out ale and spirits. Ready with prayer and exhortation himself, his lordship expected everybody with him to be ready, and, although he had a sudden and irresistible way of tumbling others into religious addresses; so that, at the close of this Sunday, which I had set apart for entire quiet, I found I had made five addresses. But it was one of the most refreshing and instructive days of all our lives. As we parted that night on the streets of Louden. Liett I had been with one all our lives. As we parted that night on the streets of London, I felt I had been with one of the best men of the age. I have never met him since. Not long after he went home to his Master to receive his reward.

MR. GLADSTONE'S APPROACHABILITY

MR. GLADSTONE'S APPROACHABILITY

COME of the most unpretentious men of England are the most bighly bonored.
Gladstone is not afraid of losing his honore, while, with coat off, he swings his ax against the forest trees at Hawarden. His genteel visitors may, with gilt-edged book in hand, prefer to recline among the germiums and hawthorns of this country residence, but as Mr. Gladstone has so much backing and hewing to do at political antagonists, at Hawarden he keeps his hand in by cutting down trees.
In a picuic of working people assembled on his lawn one summer day, Mr. Gladstone, while making a little speech, said:

"We are very proud of our trees, and are therefore getting anxious, as the beech has already shown symptoms of decay. We set great store by our trees."

"Why, then," shouted one of his rough hearers, "do you cut them down as you do?"

"We cut down that we may improve. We remove retienate that we may restore health

why, then, should all of his rough hearers, "do you cut them down as you do?"

"We cut down that we may improve. We remove rottenness that we may restore health by letting in air and light. As a good Liberal you ought to understand that."

So Mr. Gladstone, though holding the strongest political pen in England, is easily accessible, and is not afraid of being contaminated by contact with his constituents.

But it is not until you get into Wales that you feel yourself perfectly helpless. If ever there was a land of unpronounceable names, surely Wales is the foremost.

A LAND OF UNPRONOUNCEABLE NAMES

A LAND OF UNPRONOUNCEABLE NAMES

THE Weish language is said to be only second in sweetness and rhythm, but the English tongue seems to be crowding it out. The melody of the Weish vernachiar I must, however, take on faith. I give my readers an opportunity of practicing the music of the names of some of the Weish valleys, such as Llangollen, Maentwrog and Ystwyth; of some of the Weish medicinal springs, such as Llanwrtyd, Trefriw and Llandrindoe; of some of the Weish mountains, such as Pencwmcerwyn and Aanfawddwy. If you are at all puzzled with the pronunciation of these names, then get one of the Weish dictionaries, entitled: "Dymchweliad allor uchel y Pub." And if then you cannot succeed you will perhaps stop, and be as ignorant as I am of a language which the Weish say has in it capacities for tenderness, and nice shades of meaning, and pathor, and thunderings of power beside which our English is insipid.

Considering the fact that the language is spoken by less than a million of people, the literature of the Weish is incomparable for extent. The first book was published in 1531, and consisted of twenty-one leaves. Four years after, another book, which they strangely called "The Bible," containing the alphabet, an almanac, the Ten Commandments, the Lord's Prayer, the Apostles' Creed, and something about their national games. An astounding "Bible" that was, Eighteen years after this another book appeared. The slow advancement was because the prominent men of the English nation wanted the Weish language to die out, on the supposition that these people would be more loyal to the throne if they all spoke the English nation wanted the Weish language to die out, on the supposition that these people would be more loyal to the throne if they all spoke the English nation wanted the Weish language to die out, on the supposition that these people would be more loyal to the throne if they all spoke the English page.

language to die out, on the supposition that these peopee would be more loyal to the throme if they all spoke the English language. But, afterward, the printing press of Walesgot into full awing, and now books and periodicals by the hundreds of thousands of copies are printed and circulated in the Weish language. But, excepting a few ballads of an immoral nature, corrupt literature dies as soon as it touches this region.

Many bad English novels that blight other countries cannot live a month in the pure at-mosphere of these mountains. The fact is, that the Welsh are an intensely religious peo-ple, and one of their foremost men declares that in all their literature there is not one book atheistic or infidel.

The namby-pamby traveler, afraid of getting his shoes tarnished, and who loves to shake hands with the tips of his fingers or with his hand on a level with his cravat, and desires conversation in a whisper, would be disgusted with Wales. But they who have nothing of the fastidions in their temperaments, and who admire strength of voice, strength of arm, who admire strength of voice, strength of arm, strength of purpose and strength of character, will find among the Welsh illimitable enter-tainment and opportunities for profitable study. They are the most genial and hearty of all people, I think, I have ever met. When they laugh they laugh, and when they cry they cry, and when they cheer they cheer, and there is no half-way work about it. They are sincere, and they are natural in showing their EARLY MORN IN SCOTLAND

T is now seven o'clock in the morning, I is now seven o'clock in the morning, and I am writing at a window looking out upon the river Tay, which is the Rhine of Scotland. When the Romans, many centuries ago, first enught sight of it, they exclaimed: "Eccs Tiber!" within sight of scenery which Walter Scott made immortal in his "Fair Maid of Perth." The heather running up the hills to join the morning cloud of the same color, so that you can hardly tell which is beather and which is cloud, beauty terrestrial and celestial, intertwined, interbocked, interspun, intermarried. The inceuse of a gentleman's garden burning toward beaven in the fires of the fresh rising sun. Ivy on the old walls; rockeries dashed with waterfall and fringed with ferms; hawthorn hedges the old walls; rockeries dashed with waterfall and fringed with ferns; hawthorn hedges which halt the eye only long enough to admire, before it leaps over. The glades, the farmsteads, the soft plush of the grass which has reveled in two months of uninterrupted moisture. Seated in an arm chair that an ancient king might in vain have wished for, writing on a table that fairly writhes with serpents and dragons and gorgons done in mahogany—what a time and place to take pen and paper for communication with my Journal readers!

TRAITS OF THE SCOTCHMAN

THERE is something about the Scotch character, whether I meet it in New York, or London, or Perth, that thrills me through and through. Perhaps it may be because I have such a strong tide of Scotch blood in my own arteries. Next to my own beloved country give me Scotland for residence and grave. The nearly are in such downright and grave. The people are in such downright earnest. There is such a roar in their mirth, like a tempest in "The Trossacks."

Take a Glasgow audience, and a speaker must have his feet well planted on the plat-form, or he will be overmastered by the sym-form, or he will be overmastered by the sym-pathy of the populace. They are not askamed to cry, with their broad palms wiping away the tears, and they make no attempt at sup-pression of glee. They do not simper, or snicker, or chuckle. Throw a joke into a Scotchman's ear and it rolls down to the center of his displaragm and then spreads out both ways, toward the foot and brow, until the emotion becomes volcanic, and from the longest hair on the crown of the head to the tip end of the nail on the big toe there is parlongest hair on the crown of the head to the tip end of the nail on the hig toe there is paroxysm of cachination. No half and half about the Scotch character. What he hates, he hates; what he likes, he likes. And he lets you know it right away. He goes in for Lord Saulsbury or William E. Giadstone, and is altogether Tory or Liberal. His politics decided, his religion decided; pet him right, and he is magnificently right; get him wrong, and he is magnificently right; get him wrong, and he is awfully wrong. A Scotchman seldom changes. By the time he has fairly landed on his feet in this world he has made up his mind, and he keeps it made up. If he dislikes a fiddle in church you cannot samagle it in under the name of a bass viol. And I like this perdstence. Life is so short that a man can't afford to change his mind.

BAPTIZING A SCOTTISH BABY

BEFORE I forget it, I must tell you how I imptised a Scotch baby down in the center of England, and with this I must close. It was about ten o'clock at night, at the close of a lecture, and in the private partor of a hotel, that a rap was heard at the door. Word came in that a young man was there, desiring me to officiate at a baptism. I thought there must be some mistake about it, and so delayed my appearance.

Word came in that a young man was there, desiring me to officiate at a baptism. I thought there must be some mistake about it, and so delayed my appearance.

About five minutes before the starting of the rail train I came to the door of the private parlor and confronted a young man in a high state of excitement. He said that he had come all the way from Scotland to have me baptize his child. I told him the thing was impossible, for the train would go in five minutes. But this only made the man more intense. So I said: "Where is the baby? I have no time to wait." The young man rushed down stairs, and returned with the nother and child. As she unvolted the boy from her plaid there came to sight the prophecy of a genuine Roderick Dhu. I wanted an hour to baptize a boy like that. Scotch all over. What cheek bones, and what a fix! Give him plenty of porridge and the air of Loch Vennachar, and what a man he will make! Chief of Clan Alpine! I asked the mother what she was going to call him, and she said "Douglass!" What a name, suggestive of victory, defeat, warrior, blades and gates of Stirling Castle!

But it was no time to indulge in Scottish reminiscences. If that infant Highlander was to be baptized by me it must be within the next sixty seconds. I had the father and the mother, and the baby, and the minister, but no water. I hastily scanned all the vases and cups in the room. There was no liquid in all the place save the cocon left over from the evening repast. "Get some water in a second," I almost demanded. From the next room the father returned in a moment, bringing a glass of it, clear, bright water, fit to christen a Douglass, opaline as though just dipped by Rob Roy from Loch Katrine. "Douglass!" I called him, as the water flashed upon the lad's forehead, quick and bright as the gleam of Fitz James' blade at Inverlechy. I had no time for making out a formal certificate, but only the words, "Baptism, August—th," the name of Douglass and my own. As I darted for the cars, the "Life of Robert McCheyne," the gl broch among the Scottish hills.

ERHAPS I may be taking a very radical stand, but I think it is the right one. The right of every woman horn is to look her best, and the girl who does not do this, who permits herself to look untidy, who allows her look untidy, who allows her look untidy be arranged in an look untidy, who allows her hair to be arranged in an unbecoming manner, and who does not care whether her finger nails are in mourning for the rest of her appearance or not, is the girl I would like to strike off my list. It is the right of every woman, and when I say every woman I mean every girl, to look not only her best, but as pretty as she can. when I say every woman I mean every girl, to look not only her best, but as pretty as she can. She owes it to the world at large.

When the good God made men strong He made women beautiful, and though the beauty of the heart is, after all, the greatest, that of the face is the outward expression. If your temper is had, it shows in your ugly, tightly-fixed lips. If you have been careless, and permitted your digestion to get out of order, it shows itself in a badly biotched complexion. If you are indolent and indifferent, your eyes lack clearness and brightness; and if you are lary, the ugly arrangement of your hair tells the story. Most of all, if you do not care enough for somebody to give a gentle pressure of the hand that may mean, "I sympathize with you," or "I will help you," or, "I love you," then the hands are rough to the touch, the skin is not white, and they are hard as the proverbial rock. Now you see what I claim for women's rights; these rights once taken possession of will control the world, for a loving, sweet face will do more to influence a vote in the right direction than all the load speeches ever made by politicians. all the load speeches ever made by politicians.

THE BEAUTY OF THE HANDS

A LI the poets have written about beautiful hands, all the painters have given to the women who represented their ideals the most lovely hands, and lovers all over the world dilate on the slender and aristocratic or dimpled hands of those who rule their hearts. It has been said that it takes five generations of gentle breeding to form a beautiful hand; but this may be doubted, inasmuch as some of the most delicate and best shaped hands are frequently seen not only among women who do manual labor. "But," says somebody, "keeping the hands in perfect order means a great deal of trouble." Well, it may require a little thought at first, but it is regumeans a great deal of trouble." Well, it may require a little thought at first, but it is regular, rather than troublesome, treatment that is necessary. If your hands have gotten into a bad condition, just begin by giving them, for a week or two, a bath every night. You laugh at the idea of a bath for your hands, but it is a special kind of a bath you want, for you are treating ten good little workers, and trying to get them in good condition.

THE CARE OF THE HANDS

So from the druggiat get enough silver sand Si from the druggist get enough silver sand to cover the bottom of a basin, and on this pour very hot water, throwing in some small pieces of soap, so that a lather is quickly formed. Then put in both hands, enduring the hot water, and washing one hand over the other for about ten minutes. After this dry them with a soft towel, pressing down with it the skin that is around the mail, and which this treatment has loosened. Then use some pleasant cold cream, strawberry, or any other unquent that you fancy, taking a little at a time, and rubbing it in so well that your hands will entirely lose that unpicusant greasy feelwill entirely lose that impleasant greasy feel-ing that often comes. The next morning give them a good bath in tepld water, with soap, using the nail brush, but not using it too roughly. If your nails are inclined to be brittle rab a little vaseline on each one every night; this will soften and whiten them, and cause the offensive skin which grows about their roots, as weeds about a flower, to be easily pushed down. The professional manicure is given to cutting this skin. I do not believe in this. If it cannot be pushed down after the hand bath with a soft towel, or with a small stick, then it needs the softening treatment that comes from vascline, or one of the creams. Once you begin to cut the skin it grows with great rapidity; and from my own experience I can say that you will have sore and bleeding I can say that you will have sore and bleeding nails that are neither pretty nor necessary. If a stain comes on your mails, a little lemon juice will quickly remove it. If your hands are inclined to get red, learn to hold them up, rather than down, and remember that tight lasing will not only make a red nose, but will also make red hands. A child has, curiously enough, a keen appreciation of a beautiful hand, and will notice it, and grasp for it sooner than it will a beautiful face. You know, my dear girls, as well as I, that the beautiful hands than it will a bessetting save.

dear girls, as well as I, that the beautiful hands in the world are those that are not only perfectly kept, but which do lovely service, feetly kept, but which do lovely service, smoothing the brow of the sick, touching gently the sad wounds, and knowing how to express by a gentle pressure that which the lite may not speak. It is the heart's own way of telling of sympathy. THOSE DREADFUL PRECKLES

THEY seem to trouble nine girls out of every ten, and I am sure I do not know why. In the first place, the girl who has a freekle or two on her face announces to the world at large that she uses neither paint nor powder. Then, too, she tells that she has been living in that best of all things—the sunshine, But, somehow, the freckles trouble her; her sweetheart thinks they are rather pretty. But she does not agree with him. And she is always asking: "What will take away the freckles?"
Weil, my dear girl, if you got them a week are or a month are or saven time doring the nsking: "What will take away the freckles?"
Weil, my dear girl, if you got them a week ago, or a month ago, or some time during the summer, the juice of the lemon, with a teaspoonful of borax in it, dabbled on them, will cause them to disappear. That is, if you apply this treatment regularly, not if you put it on to-night, and forget it the three nights more to follow. Sometimes, if they have only just come, a few drops of benzoin, put in the water until it gives it a milky look, used for a few days, will cause them to disappear. And, by the by, a very nice woman wrote and told me that she could not get benzoin at any drug shop in town. Well, just let her tell the chemists thenselves that they keep a very poor stock of goods when they have not that. Five or six drops of it in a basin of water will make it look like skim milk, and make it smell like the fir or cedar trees, while it will cool a sunburned face, and give what doctors call "tone" to the skin. But, my dear girls. I do not want you to bother about the freekles. They are really not worth it. Instead, make up your mind that they are sun spots, put on your face to tell the world of the sunny disposition that you have, and of the glad spot that you make at home.

THE COLORLESS GIRL

THE COLORLESS GIRL

SHE is always coming to me with a moan.

She says her skin has no color, that it is not even clear white; that it looks pasty and gray. I have given her advice and advice, but I am going to try it once more. Her skin will be pasty just as long as she thinks sweets are better than roast beef, cake more delightful better than roast beef, cake more delightful than potatoes, and preserves to be given the preference to healthy soup. She upoets her stomach, and then she wonders that her face, which is the thermometer of her stomach, should change as it does. To get a clear skin she must eat properly, exercise well, and keep her temper in good order. A clear white skin may be perfectly healthy, but a pasty one is not. There is no use in recommending any patent wash to clear this skin, for it will not do it. First of all, it needs severe treatment from the doctor, with the diet laws strictly followed. After that I can recommend, as does my friend Mrs. Mallon, a few drops of gin thrown into the water in which mend, as does my friend Mrs. Mallon, a few drops of gin thrown into the water in which the face is bathed. This will tend to exhibit rate the skin, and even to cause a little color to come to the surface. But, living properly, obeying what your doctor has to say, and taking regular exercise, will do more for the pasty skin than anything else in the world. Though, by the by, you must not get into the habit of sleeping in too hot a room; dress in a warm one, but sleep in a cool one, and following my other suggestions, the pasty skin, like the ugly girl, will be a thing of the past.

YOUR EYES AND BROWS OF course, my dear girls, you want your eyes to look clear and bright, and your hows to be well shaped. About your eyes: They will never be clear unless your digestion is in good order, and they will never be bright unless you have made up your mind to give happiness to some one else, and then it is reflected in them. As to your eyebrows, if they have an aggressive way of standing up, and do not shape themselves well, just dip your finger in the vaseline overy night, press them down to place, making them shape the desired curve. If they are very heavy, brush them with a tiny soft brush, but do not, under any with a tiny soft brush, but do not, under any consideration, permit anybody to induce you to cut them, for they will only grow in thick, stiff and ugly. If, through some accident, you have an absolute lack of eyebrows, I do recommend one simple deception, and that is the soft eyebrow pencil, which may be gotten in any color, only costs ten cents, and yet drawn cleverly over the brows, or the place where the brows ought to be, will give the expression to your face that was there when the brows had not disappeared. By the br, I wish that none not disappeared. By the by, I wish that none of my girls would ask me about depilatories. I think all of them more or less injurious, and when the use of them is once commenced it has to be kept up. If you do what is right, it is go-ing to look out straight from your eyes and tell the story to all the world; it is going to make them beautiful, bright wells of thought; this going to make them, in reality, the win-dows of the soul—of the soul that is good and pure. For my beauty training I recom-mend nothing that will do any harm; but there is plenty of time in life—plenty of time between the working hours for the girl to take care of herself, and to make herself lovely, and that is what I want all my girls to do. I want them to be full of love in their hearts, and I want this love to speak out in the loveliness

WHAT YOU WANT * * TO KNOW * * 1

Under this heading I will cheerfully answer each month any question I can, sent me by my girl readers—RUTH ASHMORE.

J. F. S.—Girls of seventeen should wear their dresses

EMILLE-Your questions as to what a man requires to study at college will be best answered by a professor in one of the colleges.

MCLLY Bawn—As you are studying in a class under the artist, there would be no impropriety in your posing before the class for him.

ANNA-In addressing a letter to a gentleman, it is considered better form to write: "Mr. John Brown," rather than "Mr. J. Brown."

C. N.—For suggestions as to the care of the skin refer to the article on "The Care of the Complexion," by Mrs. Mailon, in the August Journal.

A From Banker-Mitts are not considered in good taste with evening dress; instead, kid gloves either dressed or undressed aboutd be worn.

B. M.—Ordinary toliet powder will do to dust the hands before the gloves are assumed. There is a powder sold for this purpose, but a good plain powder will assewer just as well.

M. A. AND OTHERS—The first effects of sulphur and molasses is to bring out on the skin all the impurities in the system, but these will wear away in time, and your skin will be white, smooth and clear.

Passy—It is usually customary to delay beginning to eat your dinner until some of the others at the table have been served. (2) Finger bowls are not put on the table until the descert has been removed.

Listan—It is proper to recognize, by bowing, ac-qualitances whom you may see on the other side of the street. It is not necessary to attempt to astract a young man's attention so that he will see you and how to you.

SEP-As you live out of town it would be the most courseous and proper thing, when your suciety meets at your house, to give them some simple cotertalument, either in the form of a bea, or in any manner that you desire.

L. E. N.—Even "Leap Year" does not excuse your kissing the hand of the man friend who brought you some flowers. (2) I should think you risked breaking your next if you attempted to retain a man sarm while he was driving.

J. J. V.—Give your card to the servant at the door and go into the parior until you bear whether your friend is at home or not. The proper visiting card is a stadium-stand one of plain white, with name and address en-graved upon it.

R. T. R.—The third finger is the one counting from the index finger, the thumb not being included as a fin-ger. (2) it would not be proper to wear jewelry while you are in mourtain, though, of course, no objection is made to an engagement or wealting ring.

M. G.—White moreoeffice de sole will make a pretty wedding dress, and as it is quite wide will not be very expensive. (2) fore, saisate, old mean, immension and of course, bride's cake makes a sultable simurner supper. (3) An the wedding is in the evening, the bridegroom should be in the usual evening dress.

Helen — I think even if you only serve ice cream and cake it will be wiser and more comfortable to have it on the table. As the party is so small you will seed so other refreshments, add you can make your table look pretty by an arrangement of flowers or ferns in the center, and the dishes holding the pretty cakes will tend to decicate it.

May F.—In answer to the invitation, write on note paper and not on your visiting eard; "Miss May accepts with pleasure the kind invitation for Munday, June twenty-fourth, at eight o'clock." It is not necessary to reply to an "at home" card; that is, if you do not go you send your eard, either by post or messenger to represent you.

Hutson—Your friends are quite right. When you have finished eating, your knife and fork should be laid side by side at the side of the plate. It is not proper to git the dishes one on top of another. Leave that for the maid servant. I fully appreciate your desires to learn to do what is right, for the small proprieties of life make it smooth.

M. L. P.—When your plate is passed for a second helping of some dish, lay the knife and fork well at one side so that there may be sufficient room for the server to give you what you wish daintily. (3) The speaking of kind words is not of necessity flattery. If people took more care to speak the kind words life would be richer and foller in every way.

L. A. S.—When you are asked by a friend to correspond with bin or her, and do not care to do it, and yet do not wish to hart their feelings by refusing, it will be wheat to asswer the first two or three letters, making the time between each one a little longer until gradually the correspondence drope. (2) Formal correspondence is asidom carried on nowadays, people only writing when they have something to say to each other.

Litt-I do not think that fee cream is injurious, but I cannot advise exactly how much any one person should ear. (2) Do you think you would care any more fly me if you know how old it am? And do not you think there is a little lack of courtesy in asking my age, and also in asking me if I am a Christian? Try and remember that the first evidence of real Christianity is the deing unto others as you would be done by, and that would, of course, mean not asking hispertinent questions.

D. E. S.—A waitress abould, of course, altered to the strangers at the table at first; when there are no strangers present the table at members of the family should be eaten with a bork. (1) The words "mother," "aunt," "course," are only written with a capital when some special one is referred to. (4) I cannot recommend any face powder, although I believe there are some fine ones that, properly used, are not injurious. (5) Plain, white letter paper, ournied, is always in best taste.

Burn Even.—I do think it destrictly wrong for a sixty white letter paper, corrolled, is always in best tasse.

Billie Erres—I so think it decidedly wrong for a girt to permit a man to like her rolless he is engaged to be married to her; and even when that state of afficirs oxion I think that she will find that her kisses will be inove appreciated if she is not too generates with them. (2) If, as you say, you have a pleasant home and a little who is willing to lake care of you, I think you are doing wrong to go out into the world that you may make more money. A woman's place is essentially in the home, and when she is placed as you are she is simply taking the hered and butter from some other girl's mosth when she forces her way into the working world and claims a position there.

A Street entitle ANN MANY Opticities—There are so many of my dear girls who have said kind words to me that I want to thank them again and again. Ferhaps it may interest them to know that for some time I have been a bit of an invialid, and if their letters have not received the quick responses that they or pected it has been because, though the lecury was willing, the brain and the incode were weak. I also want to ask of them not to request me to give any advice along patent medicines, about depthalories, about hand-writing, or various shades of hair. I know I have only to sek this, for as love begets love. I am evitain that my affection for my girls has given me a real love in return.

E. V.—In calling upon two sisters, or a mother and a daughter, two cards should be left. In visiting your frield from out of town you absold certainly sak for her hoddens, express repret if you do not see her, and leave a cardion her. (i) While visiting in a strange city it is perfectly proper to send a card to a man friend small open which is written your pressus address and the length of time you'll be there. (i) While a man friend small you flow you'll be there. (ii) While a man friend small you flow with the time to coverage to offer him a boutounders. (i) After a westeling reception it is not necessary to offer him a boutounders. (i) After a westeling reception it is not necessary to express thanks for a pleasant time. The bride thanks each one who webless her meach happiness. (ii) When your mother is on your heaters is out, you need give no indecation of the fact that she was not with you.

THE JEWESS IN AUTHORSHIP

BY ABRAM S. ISAACS

HE literary and learned woman who used to be an object of profound curiosity has ceased to be a rarity. With the new education, and woman's rapid ad-vance in all fields of activity, she turns naturally to literature, and the world is the gainer. It is true France, Germany, Italy and England numbered their women writers a century and more before Sorosis was organ-ized, and America had women poets and novel-ists long before Vassar was founded, or Harvard dreamed of an annex. But the recent awakening has been on a scale peculiar to our own age, and bids fair to assume still more imposing proportions in the near future.

WHAT is the relation of the Jewess to this literary revival? What part does she take in authorship? Is she silent or responsive? What is her record?

Restricting ourselves to English and American literature, it is not to be expected that Jewesses as yet are closely identified with authorship to any large degree. In our own country, for instance, it is obviously unfair to compare the Jewess with the non-Jewess in the realm of literature. The fornier must have a little more time for development. As late as 1850 the number of American Israelites was limited to some thousands; to-day the As late as 1850 the number of American Israelites was limited to some thousands; to-day the Jewish population is still comparatively small —a few hundred thousand. Bearing in mind the vast proportion of emigrants who have to be fused into an American type, it would certainly be premature to demand any marked literary development. The great majority have to work for their daily bread in less fascinating fields than literature.

TWO-Jewesses, the one at rest in the old TWO*Jewesses, the one at rest in the old Jewish cemetery in distant Frankfort-on-the-Main, and the other in Cypress Hills, in the fast-growing city of the deal close to New York, take rank with representative literary women of our age. The works of both belong to the present, and are likely to survive for decades to come. It was in 1847 that Grace Aguilar passed away in her thirty-first year. Her stories, such as "Home Influence," "The Days of Bruce," "The Vale of Cedars," reveal not alone a high order of literary excellence, but vigor and maturity. Of fragile physique, but remarkable intellectuality, she devoted her powers to authorship. But hers was a higher but remarkable intellectuality, she devoted her powers to authorship. But hers was a higher aim than merely to amuse. In her retigious works, and those bearing on Jewish history and doctrine, in prose and verse, she strove to raise her race to a loftier consciousness of their duty and mission, and to educate the general public as to the character of her creed, so often misjudged and caricatured. Her writings breathe a spiritual aroma that indicate the true woman, a refreshing breatht of view, and a chivalrous ardor. It was a woman battling for truth, education, liberality, and her works have won her a place in the ranks of the best and purest of womankind.

Of Emma Lazarus it is unnecessary to say sught. Her works praise her in the gates. Like Grace Aguilar, she was inspired by high ideals, but she was more fortunate in her surroundings, and enjoyed the friendship of roundings, and enjoyed the friendship of prominent American authors, while Emerson prominent American authors, while Emerson was her guide, and she was a guest at his Concord home. She loved art and music, Heine and the Greeks. Her "Admetus" is a singularly polished and graceful poem; her translations from Heine show strength and beauty. Her "Altic"—a prose romance of Goethe's youth—isattractive in its luxuriance of phrase. But not all the claims of general culture made her silent when her voice was to be heard on a different theme, and her poems in behalf of the Russian Jews disclosed her spiritual fire. With no less enthusiasm she advocated manual training and agricultural pursuits for the Russian immigrants. Like Grace Aguilar she died too early to accomplish her ideals. In literary breadth and insight she was superior to her English sister, but not in intensity of religious conviction.

No literary Jewesses of the past or present compare with those two Esthers of the pen. Penina Moise, whose hymns were the subject of an appreciative article in the "Critic" a year or two ago, Rebekah Hyneman, whose "The Leper and Other Poems," was published in Philadelphia in 1853, Mrs. was published in Philadelphia in 1853, Mrs. Celia Hartog, the author of graceful tales and poems—the list is not a long one that survives. The encouragement given to young writers in the pages of Mr. Leeser's "Occident," a Philadelphia pioneer in Jewish journalism, and the favorable opportunity offered women writers in the Jewish press of to-day, have not been without their results in fitting them for a wider literary field, which some are them for a wider interary held, which some are already occupying, with every indication of success. Lee C. Harby's earliest effects thus won recognition. Helen K. Weil has done more than apprentice work. Mrs. Rosalle Kanfman, Josephine Lazarus, Mary M. Cohen, Mrs. Apale Nathan Meyer, Mrs. M. D. Louis, Ella Jacobs, Henrietta Szold (who translated att elaborate biography of Fleischer, the Orientalist, for the Smithsonian Report, 1889), Debbie H. Silver, Jennie W. Netter, Frances Hellman, Ruth Ward Kahn, Nina Morais Cohen, Mrs. S. A. Dinkins, are not unfamiliar names, and the list could be increased by Mrs. Rosa Sonneschein, Caroline Cohen, Myrtilla Mitchell, Annetta Kohn, Belle Moses, Isabella R. Hess, Elizabeth F. Aaron, and among the English sisterhood by Emily Harris, Amy Levy, Re Henry, Ada S. Ballin, Rosa Emma Collins, "The History and Literature of the Israelites," by the Misses de Rothschild, is a work of merit. They were not the only members of that family to engage in literature. Anna Maria Goldsmid translated from the German and French, and her volumes possess permanent worth as a vindication of Jewish doctrue from the liberal point of view. Miss Goldsmid, who died a year or two ago, belonged to one of the most representative Jewish families in England, Mrs. Harriet Lieber Cohen, of New York recently issued a translation of Sacher-Mosoch's, "The New Job," and has ready for publication a collection of his short tales from the French. Bella Löwy is the chief English translator of Grutz's "History of the Jews;" Mrs. C. H. T. Collis has published a book of travels; Lady Magnus "Jewish Portraits" and "Outlines of Jewish History" have been reprinted in Boston and Philadelphia respectively. The success of Martha Morton, of New York, as a dramatist, has been proved by her "The Morehant," and "Geoffrey Middleton, Gent." This list, which does not claim to be exhaustive, throws light on the versatility of the Jewes, at least. She can write graceful pootry, translate learned historical works, become historian and essayist, contribute stories and sketches to the magazines, publish tales for the sensor self-traceial departments in the press. poetry, translate learned historical works, become historian and essayist, contribute stories and sketches to the magazines, publish tales for the young, edit special departments in the press, issue a Hebrew grammar—as did Ada S. Ballin—and enter into the spirit of Browning, like Mary M. Cohen. She can be critic, satirist, idealist, philosopher. She need not confine her efforts to Judga. She can claim a hearing from the public at large on all themes dear to humanity, and if she does her work well recognition will follow. She is not likely to forget the claims of her own special race, their elevation and enlightenment, but she will be qualified to advance on a line with cultured woman-bood of every nation and creed. bood of every nation and creed.

I T is not difficult to forecast the future of the Jewess in authorship. She is a partaker in the new education; she enters all the professions; she shares the ripest culture of the time; she responds to every movement that leads to honest, helpful living. The educated Jewess who graduates from Vassar or Bryn Mawr, from Cornell or Barnard, who pursues higher collegiate training at Harvard or Vale. higher collegiate training at Harvard or Yale, is on the same intellectual level as her non-Jewish chum. Her work in literature will follow the bent of her tastes and capacities, and will not be so much a question of her an-cestral religion. Her woman hood and woman-liness will guide her right, and as the religious instincts of the Jewess are innate, and her domestic qualities strong, one may expect her to champion all that is pure, and sweet, and wholesome. She will be enthusiastic and resolute, but however positive her convictions, she will not be less feminine in their utter-ance. Her ideals will be those of her age, and inspiration the never-ending, ever-varying drama of humanity.

THE work of the Jewess in authorship will hardly vary in quality and tone from that of her non-Jewish sister, and the charm and potency of her message will depend upon her spiritual insight and intellectual range. But there is every probability that for some years to come her attention will be largely devoted to education. The problems which are due to the Russian exodus, the spectacle of poverty, ignorance, over-crowding in our large cities must influence the sympathetic women of Israel. The American Jewish Publication and Historical Societies furnish a congenial field for her efforts, and in the department of Jewish Sabbath school-and devotional litera-Jewish Sabbath school.and devotional litera-ture many can find ample opportunity for their talent. She has become a leading factor in charitable movements, and her experience in the class room and kindergarten, in personal service among the poor and agencies for sanitary relief, will prove fruitful in due time. One Jewess, prominent in her day in education, furnished the model of "Rebecca" to Sir Walter Services and the line of Bebecca Courte will ter Scott, and the line of Rebecca Gratzes will

We find, then, that despite obvious limitations due to small numbers and very recent diafranchisement of her race, the Jewess in English-speaking lands is in touch with the literary movement of her time, and is utilizing her opportunities. She will become more and more closely identified with literature as she shares the intellectual tendencies of her en-vironment and strives to influence mankind With every barrier razed that once checked her progress, with the universities, the arts, the sciences all open to her, she feels keenly the double triumph of the century—as woman as well as Jewess. Whatever record may be hers in the future, whatever achievements she may believe a her own, she will write very new or the control of the century. claim as her own, she will write no unworthy line, utter no false note, if she be true to the ideals of Judaism and womanhood. She has everything to spur her on-in the broad republic of letters there are no distinctions of sex or creed, class or condition, race or

*LITERARY * QUERIES

FRITE-I have never heard of the story of "Ernes-Davinson-The word "girt" occurs but once in the Bible.

Cuntous-Matthew Arneld was the author of the phrase "Sweetness and Light,"

Mns. L. W. M.-" Hazel Kirke," was written and dramatized by Steele Mackaye.

Victor-College journalism originated at Dartmouth in 1800 with Daniel Webster as one of the editors.

E. L.—The authors of "Don Crear de Bazan" are D'entery and Demanoir, Thehero's name and all is in Victor Hugo's "Rey Blas."

ALICE. The author of "The Sweet By and Bya," is Dr. S. Fillmore Bennett; a letter care of the Joun-NAL will be forwarded to him.

CARRIE L.—The story of "Beintions-in-Law," has never been published in book form, and can only be had in the numbers of the JOURNAL.

VERA-I know nothing of the personality of Martha inley. (2) A letter addressed to Mrs, Walcox, care of the Journal, will be forwarded to her,

Mes. P. M. H.—The story of "Dorn Thorne" was written by Charlotte M. Braeme, who often wrote under the nom de plume of "Bertha M. Clay,"

E. S. H.—Charles Brockden Brown is generally spoken of as the first American novelist. (2) "Max Acier" is the now de plants of C. Heber Clark.

Both Edna Lyail and Marie Corelli are English women; a petralt and sketch of the bome life of the former will shortly appear in the Journal.

KERLY-The southern war song, "Maryland, My Maryland" was written by James R. Randall, of Balti-more. It was published and set to music in 1861.

P. G.—I have no idea of the present whereabouts of the writer, Kalie Maud St. John, to whom you refer, whether she is living, or doing any literary work.

A. M.—"Comprehensive Physical Culture," by Mabel Jenness, will be sent you by the Journal, postage free, for $1.00; "In My Lady's Dressing Room," for $1.50.

B. S. D.—I do not know the poem "The Death of the Old Squite," but perhaps some of our readers, seeing this, can supply the information. If so, I will print it.

A. R.—" Foolscap," as applied to a certain size of paper, is said to be nothing more than an adaptation, from similarity of sound, of the Italian fogito cape, a followined sheet.

C. D.—Never send a manuscript to the home or private address of an editor. He does not like his business to follow him into his family life. He more often, very pastly, rescuts it.

FARRY Q.—No one can advise you as to which period-ical would "be most likely to accept a young writer's first effect." Everything depends upon the character of the first "effort."

Marie Louisse—The Journal, can precure and send you either one of Ella Wheeler Witton's two books of poems, "Poems of Passion," or "Poems of Pleasure" for $1.00 each, postage free.

INCUTES—Professional books and instruments in the actual possession, at the time, of a physician arriving in this country would be admitted free of duty. They would be defined as "tools of trade."

Examp.—If you wish to provide against the possibility of having a flat manageries returned to you folded, pin a request to that effect to the manascript, and any reputable editor will respect your wish.

Extrina-Members of Charles Dickens' family advise use that the novelist never expressed a particular preference for any one of his works, nor had he a favorite character, unless it was "Little Nell."

RESECTA—Thomas Hardy's novel "Tess" can be supplied to yee by the Jouannal, postage free, for $i.1s. (2) Henry Irving's "Shakespeare," with notes, is accu-rate and a good type of a popular Shakespeare.

Ina-Mr. Bok does not read manuscripts "for pay," nor will be express an opinion on your work for re-maneralism. He reads manuscripts only with one point in view, namely, their availability for Tier Lances' House Journal.

CHARLOTTE W.—The most desirable size of paper to use for the manuscript of a book is b(q | x, b(q)) and seares liberal margin on left side of sizes. Unruled paper is preferable. The test mode of forwarding a manuscript depends upon the size.

Sanam-Browning himself admitted that there was no historical foundation for his poem, "How They Brought the Good News from Ghest," the distance between the places being too long for any horse to have traversed in the specified time.

Chiristine—I cannot give a list of the names and addresses of literary syndicules in this column. As I have repeatedly said, a complete list is given in Eleanor Kirk's book, "Periodicals That Pay Contributors," which the Journal will procure and sand you, postage free, for §1.00.

H. K.—The first newspaper publishers were the Chiness. The "Journal of Pekin" was established A. D. 1911. (2) Hoomee Greekey founded the "New York Tribune" in 18st. (3) "Culda," the novelet, is a woman. Her name is Joubse do in Ramose. She is an English woman, in spite of her name.

J. R. M.—I cannot search out for you, or any one size, subtable recitations for certain occasions, or tell you where cretain "pieces" can be found. There are several good collections of recitations, suitable for all occasions, puttinbed, and by writing to the Book Department of the Jovanaa you can easily find out all about them.

F. D. X.—If you wish to copyright your play, send one dollar to the Librarian of Congress, Washington, D. C. Send also your own name and address, and a printed or type-written copy of the play, and in a few days he will be ward you a certificate of copyright. You would be perfectly safe in automiting your play to any respectable theatrical manager in the country.

Launa-The heroine of Madam Cotter's "Efrabeth; or, the Exilis of Sheria," was Pauline Lupolova, a young woman who actually walked from Siberia to Si. Petersburg to beg the Emperor to partica her father, who had been guilty of stealing joint from the Empeson Catherine. The Emperor granted her request, but her health was so broken by fatigue and exposure that she died.

ANNER B. C.—Where the author of the work you de-sire to translate is living. I should certainly first seek his permission: where the nuthor is dead, apply to the publishers. (2) Translations are generally submitted to editors without solicitation, except in special cases, where they select a certain story which they desire translated for some particular purpose. It must be re-membered that the new Copyright law secures to American authors the right to translate or to dramatize their own works.

Miss Wallforn—You have no right to ask any editor to read your manuscript "at oncs." I think authors sometimes forget the fact that the submission of a manuscript to an editor is seeking a favor at his hands, and to demand a courtesy is hardly good tasts. Editors are very basy people, and they can give only a certain portion of their time to the reading of manuscripts. Do not get the idea that they have nothing else to do. Beading manuscripts is but a very minor and insignificant part of their work.

P. A. R. W.—If you are desirous of writing for the press keep your eyes open for subjects and try by constant study and practice to obtain a clear, direct, original style. Avoid long words and long sentences, and do not attempt to imitate anybody. Have a good, unabridged dictionary upon your deek, a book of synonyms and a good. English grammar, which you will do well to study. With this advice and these aids, and a determination only to write when you have something to write about, you will succeed if you have average abilities.

SOME ADVICE TO ART STUDENTS

RING this month a great number of girls will be gathering from all parts of the States all parts of the States to various art schools in the great cities, all with the view of study-ing in the different branches, but in many cases with widely different aims and objects. Some are now coming for the first time, perhaps having obtained their present opportunities through their own personal exertions, and are full of hope and enthusiasm, but without a very definite idea of what is before them, and of the path which must be trodden to reach their goal. Others are well advanced in their work and settling down—to continue our metaphor—into a good, steady, swinging gait, metaphor—into a good, steady, swinging gait, which means success in the end. Out of the vast army of so-called "students," these words are addressed to those earnest workers who are beginning or persevering with a true love of their art and the legitimate ambition of one day "doing something," whether their aim be already a definite one, or at present unsettled in detail.

To those who are beginning, or about to make a start, it may be said and reiterated in any number of ways and with endless good reasoning, but always coming down to the same simple piece of advice: learn to draw before attempting to paint; learn to draw before attempting to paint; learn to draw well; learn to draw thoroughly. Begin at the beginning, and do not expect to start in the life class. Work steadily upward, but be content with slow progress at first. The early steps in acquiring any knowledge are always more or less difficult because of the drudgery entailed. A girl coming from some little country place, where knowledge of art was scanty and her own efforts and struggles onward almost the only experience in actual work that she has known, will learn much in the first few weeks by observation and by contact with her fellow-workers, both as to her present capabilities and future prospects. Much will be a revelation, and she will be fortunate if sufficiently quick to realize from the first how probably mistaken, or at least incomplete, her own previous notions of the character and requisite period of a thorough art education have been. Whatever the ultimate ambition, or the definite aim in view, the beginning will be invariably the same, and in joining any art school it is wisest to follow out exactly the course suggested by the directors of the classes and to take their advice, after having stated to them clearly one's requirements and object in studying. In the early stages of education in any pursuit, it is best for the student to rely on the judgment of experienced persons rather than to persist unreasonably in her own views, which in rare case may be justifiable, but are usually only obstinately, held to in tha face of contrary advice, as the result of good and entered upon, ought to brace the student against the decidedly irritating comments of her friends and acquaintances, who realize as little as she herself did once, the methods of an a PIECE of practical advice which girl care for the first time, will do well to heed, is care for the first time, will to went to next, as the counsel to be prudent and regular as to meals and exercise. Much has been written from time to time about the importance of having a proper mid-day repast, and the folly of women who habitually perform a long day's work on insufficient nourishment, and it is to be hoped that few are unwise enough to deliberately risk the undermining of their constitution by disregarding medical advice and authority on this point. The other requi-site to good health, namely, adequate exercise and recreation, is no less important. The close application and the montal exercise. close application and the mental exertion entailed in art work demands daily relaxation and, if possible, out-door sports, or at least plenty of walking, but preferably with some object in view and with a companion, for a solitary constitutional is with most of us a poor antidote to nervous fatigue. Some kind of recreation which takes the thoughts entirely of recreation which takes the thoughts entirely away from one's work, giving change of occupation to the mind as well as to the body, is recommended by all doctors in giving advice for a healthy rule of life. Driving, riding on horseback, playing tennis, or going in for gymnastic training are all good tonics, while riding a bleycle, when not indulged in to excess, is most healthful and of growing popularity among the brain-workers of to-day, who are sensible enough to recognize the necessity of caring for their physical well-being.

POLLOWING the first period of enthusiastic beginnings and ardent hopes, comes almost invariably a time of great depression and discouragement, which is by no means an indication of failure or incapability, but quite the contrary. A self-satisfied pupil is always the most disheartening to a teacher. But to the student the periodical recurrence of these fits of discouragement are very trying, and the student the periodical recurrence of these fits of discouragement are very trying, and unless met in a philosophical spirit, may prove a hindrance to progress. Perhaps after some successful attempt, which actually had seemed a promise of real advance in the work undertaken, a day follows full of failures, owing to some unrecognized cause, which results in a fresh access of disgust at one's own slowness, and doubts of ever making headway. More experienced hands will unite in advocating the student to take fresh courage, and to make renewed efforts in the face of even the stupidest blunders. Encouragement ought to come with the realization that the best lessons are not only learned, but much more deeply imwith the realization that the best lessons are not only learned, but much more deeply impressed, through the painful experience of our own fallures. We may have a principle expounded to us, and may have even at the time appreciated it to some extent, but the truth of it is never so forcibly brought home to us until after we have by beedlessness or inability failed through its disregard. Everyone must learn their own lessons by separate and individual experience, a master can only guide, admonish, or correct. This is true of education of any kind, most clearly expressed by the oft-heard exclamation: "I have been frequently told so-and-so, but now I see it for myself," and every fresh lesson learned in thus coming to see for one's self is an added revelation, giving a new sense of power to the revelation, giving a new sense of power to the pupil. Some temperaments are more prone to alternate fits of elation and depression than others, although this characteristic is more or others, although this characteristic is more or less common to all artistic natures. Certainly depression and discouragement should be bravely fought against, because indulged they simply increase and paralyze all the powers and energies, more often causing failure than being actually the result of it. The very nature of art work being, if earnestly undertaken, really very exhausting, increases any previous tendency to nervous depression, and it is safe to advise students never to try to judge for themselves of their progress at the end of a long and trying day. So much has been said on this subject because this liability to unwarranted discouragement is a very real evil among some of our students, and is apt to affect both health and spirits, so greatly do the physical and the mental react one upon the other in our complex being.

SOONER or later, if a student perseveres steadily, there will come a day when, with a glad sense of power and a humble realization of the vast amount yet to be learned, the feeling will be experienced that the first principles of one's art have been truly mastered, and that one has gotten beyond the early groping, tentative efforts, and is beginning, even while still often falling short in actual results, yet to see and to understand more clearly the requirements and possibilities of the work, with an increasing facility in its execution. From this date a new era should commence, with a redoubling of efforts and a yet braver facing of difficulties, with the encouraging recollection of past success. A failer use of one's time becomes possible with increased ability. At this point the cultivation of a habit of constant sketching, more particularly with a regard to the future spectuation of the study which by now has in all probaparticularly with a regard to the future spec-ialty in view, which by now has in all proba-bility been determined on, will prove of un-told value. The drawing afterward from memory all the careful studies and sketches made in class from still life or from living made in class from still life or from living models is recommended as the most excellent possible practice by experienced artists. It trains the faculty of observation and makes the student more and more quick to see and to remember, giving a habit of thoroughness and attention to detail which it is most advantageous to acquire and which, carried into the higher branches of art and employed in con-junction with a certain refinement and senstitiveness of artistic feeling, together with the power of giving vivid and adequate expression to that which is so inwardly perceived, goes far to make up the sum of great genius.

W TH advanced students, the principal danger to be feared in the training received in an art school is that of falling into conventional habits of thought and expression. This must be earnestly combatted by the pendstent effort to think and see for one's the pensistent effort to think and see for one's soil and the giving the fullest possible scope to one's own individuality and imagination, and particularly avoiding the fatal weakness of copying, consciously or unconsciously, the tricks or methods of any favorite or admired master or fellow student. To do so simply fetters the freedom of a proper and full development of the powers, and stifles the originality which each human being surely does possess, unless it has been put to death through overmuch or mistaken training. overmuch or mistaken training,

FRENCH TAPESTRY PAINTING

THE PROCESS OF STEAMING

HEN the painting of a tapestry in the French dyes is finished, it is necessary to fix the colors by the action of steam in order to render them indelible. The process is sufficiently simple for an annateur to be able to te it successfully and with but little for an amateur to be able to undertake it successfully and with but little trouble. If the artist should not possess a regular studio, the apparatus may be set up in kitchen or outhouse, or in any convenient place, provided there is not sufficient draft to run the risk of condensing the steam, for it must be borne in mind that steam never causes moisture until it becomes condensed. The action of dry steam fixes the dyes, but in condensing it would ruin the tapestry by making the colors run.

The apparatus required consists of a cylinder making the colors run.

The apparatus required consists of a cylinder made of tin or zinc, a boiler, and either a gas or an oil stove; the former method of heating, being more reliable and less trouble to manage, should preferably be chosen when it can be conveniently used.

The cylinder, which is open at both ends, may measure from twelve to fourteen inches in diameter, and for ordinary use about sixty inches in height; for very large pieces of work it can be provided with an extra piece to give the necessary additional height, made to slip into the top and fitting tightly in place, but which is removable when not required. The boiler should be about twelve inches in depth and made so that the cylinder fits into it easily. It should stand upon feet so that the stove can be placed beneath it. In preparing to steam, fill the boiler about two-thirds full of water and place a piece of soft old toweling over the top of the boiler before putting the cylinder into it in position; this is to avoid danger from the splashing of the water, and to prevent the escape of steam where the cylinder slipe into place. He sure to put in enough prevent the escape of steam where the cylinder alips into place. Be sure to put in enough water, as directed, for the results of its boiling away altogether would be disastrous.

THE tapestries which are to be steamed must be sewn together to make one continuous piece, which, for a cylinder of the dimensions named, may be in length a vard and a half, or slightly longer, and in width from three to three and a half yards. This is then rolled loosely so that in hanging the layers of canvas are quite separate, not touching each other nor the sides of the cylinder, in order that the steam may have free and equal circulation. Fasten the roll by means of string inserted with a packing needle and tied to a cross-bar, which fits over the top of the cylinder and thus holds the tapestries suspended in place. Throw a thick Turkish towel, old woolen shawl, or piece of coarse blanketing over the top of the cylinder, by which means the steam is allowed to find an outlet, but escapes slowly. Everything being satisfactorily arranged, the stove may be lighted. The time allowed for steaming is from an hour to an hour and a half and upward, counting from when the water begins to boil. Too short a period will not properly fix the dyes, and too long a steaming bleaches out the paler tones and makes the deeper coloring disproportionately heavy and strong. It is important that the water be kept boilling fast during the whole time allowed, otherwise the steam might condense and trouble ensue.

THE allotted period having elapsed, the business of taking the tapestries out must be undertaken. This should be done deliberately, without either dallying or haste. Being provided with a pair of thick gloves to prevent the hands being scorched by the hot steam, turn out the gas, remove the top covering, and standing upon a step-ladder or a chair, seize the cross-bar in the middle and lift the tapestries bodily out. Cut the fastenings of the roll, separate the pieces and hang them up to get cool. It is better not to fold tapestries for some little while after they are steamed, for the canvas seems to retain a certain stiffness just at first which causes the appearance of secratch marks where the piece is doubled over. After several months they become perfectly soft and may be folded without injury, although at all times it is perhaps better to roll them on a stick.

ARTISTIC SACHETS

THE following suggestions give a pretty and novel idea for the decoration of sachets of any shape or size, in dimensions according to the purpose for which they are intended. They are treated to represent framed pictures.

A piece of stiff paper or thin card-board is cut out of the requisite measurements determined upon for the size of the sachet in hand. In upon for the size of the sachet in hand. In the center of this an opening is cut, which may be round, oval, or irregularly and fanci-fully shaped. The border or frame so left is covered with silk or satin of any rich or delicate tone selected, and the inner edge treated with a cord either to match, or of a gold color, or any preferred finish may be adopted. A piece of bolting cloth, which has to be afterward lined with white, is inserted in the frame to form a background for the picture, which may have for subject flowers. picture, which may have for subject flowers, figures, or any pretty and appropriate group.

A spray or wreath of flowers may be suitably painted upon the "frame," The sachet is made up and lined in the ordinary number and may be finished with lace, cord, or ribbon, paying particular attention to obtain a good barmony of the contrasted or relative tones of color employed. In the painting, either water colors or oils may be used. Water colors are easier to maringe, and perhaps give daintier results upon the bolting cloth. When oils are employed upon the fabrics they should be thinned with fresh spirits of turpentine and sparingly applied in order to avoid the danger of their spreading.

IDEAS IN ARTISTIC NEEDLEWORK

As Created and Worked out by Skillful Fingers

MAKING RUSSIAN LACE

BY SARA HADLEY

T a time when things Russian are so much in favor, some specimens of modern Russian lace making will doubtless prove interesting. The illustrations here given are sufficient to show its peculiar characteristics, and to serve as a guide to those workers who might care to design for themselves larger pieces of work of themselves larger pieces of work of as same style,

The manner of making this heavy lace renders it so durable that it would seem almost impossible for it to wear out.

It is composed entirely of needle-work stitches, no braid of any kind being introduced. It therefore takes time and patience in the working, but is propor-tionately valua-ble. The pattern should be traced

A TIDY END (Illus. No. 1) in outline on colored paper muslin, backed with a heavier material to make it strong enough to resist the pull of the work. In fact, enough to resist the pull of the work. In fact, the foundation is prepared just the same as for making modern point lace, composed of linen braids and lace stitches. The mode of working, however, is somewhat different, because instead of building up the pattern on the braid it is built up on strands of the linen thread used for making the stitches. Linen thread No. 25 is the size intended for the patterns given in the illustrations. The square dolly, Illustration No. 3, measures six and a half inches when finished.

AN OCTAGONAL DOILY (Illus, No. 2)

Begin the work by laying a double thread from corner to corner, catching it to the foundation; when the work is entirely finished the foundation must be cut away without severing the threads. Sew over and over the laid threads the whole length of them closely enough to make a strong cord, reseat the proenough to make a strong cord; repeat the pro-cess from the opposite corners; then put in the straight and corner bars in like manner. Next build up each form in its place with button-hole stitches over one or two threads, accord-ing to the required thickness, except where the atitches are open, in which case no foundation thread is needed. In every case begin with the wheel in the centre of each section of the pattern. The octagonal doily, Illustra-tion No. 2, meas-ures eight inches from point to point. The mid-dle star is first made, building it on cross bars as already de-scribed; next the bars in each point are laid, also the crossbars between each point of the cen-ter star; then the forms in buttonhole stitch filled in, starting from the star. In making the points which form the octagon the outside openwork pattern is first put in, the the long straight bars between the points are

WORKED BY ROYAL HANDS

THE two accompanying illustrations of needlework designs for sachet and sofa cushion will doubtless prove interesting over and above their intrinsic merit when it is known that they were designed by a royal lady, the Princess Louise, daughter of the Queen of England, who bernelf possessing no mean skill with pencil and brush takes a special delight in encouraging encouraging art education among wom-en. These pieces of work were designed by the Prin-cess for a so-ciety of which she is presi-dent, and which in character bears some analogy to the societies of Decorative of Decorative

Art in this country. Illustration No. 4 gives a pretty example of ribbon embroidery on a pretty example of ribbon embroidery on cream-colored satin. The material employed for the ground must be of the very best to ensure its being sufficiently close and firm to stand the puncturing necessary in order to insert the ribbon. Narrow ribbons of the most delicate coloring, both plain and shaded, are employed for working the design, as shown in the drawing. The stems and the tiny white flowers on the right-hand side of the center group, also the musical instrument, are rendered in embroidery silk.

The cushion (Illustration No. 5) is made in lines of a delicate čeru

The cushion (Illustration No. 5) is made in linen of a delicate ècru shade, finished off with a scant frill of the same edged with lace. The design on the cunter of the cushion and the border pattern on the frill are worked in flax thread of soft hues. As a border upon the cushion itself, rather a coarse lace is inserted between two rows of narrow cord, the outer one forming the edge of one forming the edge of the cushion.

TREATMENT OF LACE

THE proper treatment of the various kinds of needle-made laces, after they come from the hands they come from the hands of the worker, and before they are ready for use, is by no means an unimportant branch of the knowledge requisite for the production of really high-class work. If the pieces have become soiled in the making, which, with careful handling, should not be the case, the work must be washed in the ordinary manner; and if this be rightly done, it ought afterward to be indistinguishable from new lace. The art of cleaning and restoring lace inted among the necessary accomplish-art of cleaning and restoring laces was counted among the necessary accomplishments in the days of our great grandmothers, and no one proficient in making it, nor, indeed, any one owning real and valuable lace, ought to be ignorant of how to care for it themselves, although it is much better to let it be treated, when necessary, by a professional cleaner, than to attempt to wash or get up lace at home without knowing the proper method of doing so.

If sufficiently clean, when the work is finished new lace needs merely to be slightly damped, and pressed with a moderately hot iron. Wet a very thin cloth in water, wring it out as dry as possible. In y it over the lace and possible, lay it over the lace, and iron until the cloth is dry. For solled lace

(whether ma-chine or hand-made) wind it around a bottle, previously covered smoothly with a clean piece of white flannel, place it in a pan of clean, cold water, with a small piece of pure soap in it. Be sure not to employ the ordi-nary laundry soap, which is sometimes composed of injuri-ous ingredients. Allow the water to boil for about to boil for about an hour, gradually pouring off the dirty water, and adding clean until it ceases to become soiled. The bottle should have been partially filled with sand, in order to keep it steady in the water. If the lace should have been dirty, a small quantity of salt may be thrown into the water. For old lace which is valuable, and has become much stained, an English authority recommends soaking it in good clive oil for a number of hours, or even for several days, afterward washing it as described above.

FEATHER EDGE WORK

BY SARA HADLEY

HE illustration printed below shows a pretty and novel use for the dainty and inexpensive feather edge braid, which, al-though much employed as an edging in various kinds of work, has not hitherto found a sepa-

has not hitherto found a separate and distinctive use. The idea of constructing designs for mats and other purposes merely by twisting the braid into graceful and appropriate forms, which are afterward sewn together to keep them in place, will come as a happy suggestion to many, and more especially to those who, while appreciating pretty and dainty work, have not yet have not yet attained to any great skill with the needle. This work requires no knowledge of either lace or embroidery stitches, it necessary to catch the braid together according to the pattern chosen, by passing a thread through the "feather edge" loops. The design given here (Illustration No. 6) is intended for a doily.

A NOVEL WALL POCKET

THE particularly pretty and novel wall pocket described as follows, is rendered in materials especially suitable for a girl's sanctum, where delicate tints prevail, while

The foundation is a circle of card-board, measuring ten inches across, out of which a seven-inch opening is cut, thus leaving a cir-cular ring an inch and a half in width. This is to be covered with white linen, upon which scattered sprays in Dresden coloring are em-broidered in silk. The linen is pasted on to

The front and back of the ring are pasted together, this being a quicker and nester method of join-ing them then attenuation to the land of the this being a quicker and nester method of joining, them than attempting to do so by means of sewing. This ring is intended to lie flat against the wall, the pocket made of the silk being sewn all around to its outer edge, and forming a hanging beg about twelve inches in length. The lower part is finished by being gathered and tied together with a ribbon bow, three or four inches of the silk forming a full ruffle below, which is edged with white lace about three inches in depth. Lace slightly full is also sewn around the lower edge of the ring which forms the opening. The whole thing is suspended by three bands of ribbon coming from the center and from each side of the ring, and drawn together into one large bow at the top, bows being also placed where the side bands of ribbon start from the ring.

ON HOME DRESS MAKING BY EMMA M. HOOPER

MISS HOOPER invites, and will cheerfully answer any questions concerning bome dressmaking which may be sent to her by the JOURNAL sisters. While she will answer by mail, if stamp is inclosed, she greatly prefers to be allowed to reply through the JOURNAL, in order that her answers may be generally helpful. Address all letters to Miss Erima M. Hooper, care of The Ladies' Home Journal, Philadelphia, Pa.

REGARDING COMBINATIONS

HE owner of two or three half-worn skirts, a bit of velvet, etc., is not as foriorn as she may feel, as "make-overs" and combinations are all right for the full fushions. The shirt waist developed The shirt waist developed into a long Russian blouse, round wafst or jacket bodice is a boon to peo-ple who must save as much as possible to get one new gown a season. As velvet, silk and wool fabrics will be in style, the economical and one new gown a season. As velvet, silk and wool fabrics will be in style, the economical and ingenious home dressmaker will find her path comparatively clear, provided she mess taste and indement in combining the proper materials and shades. Now that red is again stylish, it will help out wonderfully, as it goes with nearly everything, becomes many people, and brightens up the dullest and most hopeless of contrivel gowns. A red cashmere, serge or surah waist may be worn with navy, black, green, gray or brown skirts. If possessed of only a small quantity of the red goods, make it as a plain waist coming from five to ten inches below the walst; if you have not this length then wear it under the skirt belt. A turn-over or high collar and deepcuffs, nearly to the etbow, finish the waist, and the triming may be machine stitching, feather stitching with embroidery or cross stitch embroidery done in bands on the goods in red, black, green and yellow cotton or silk. Or another style would be to edge a turn-over collar and turn-back cuffs with a knife-plaited frill of the goods, and to have a jubot ruffle of the same down the front.

STRL FURTHER DETAILS

NEARLY every one has a navy blue and a tau dress at hand, and both haveseen their "best days." Use the navy blue for a bell skirt with a flat border of tan attiched on the edges, or a cluster of alternate blue and tan bias folds or three tiny overlapping folds of tan each two inches wide. If of a short figure, use the tan for a panel on one side, which style is reappearing. Out the tan waist off, wear the skirt belt over it and add an Eton jacket and a corselet of the navy blue goods. If of a stout figure use the navy for a pointed basque, with full sleeves to the clows and a vest of tan; deep ouffs of the blue. Green and gray may be combined in the same manner, also brown and tan, or two shades of a color. gray may be combined in the same manner, also brown and tan, or two shades of a color, An old black dress can be cleaned, make after the prevailing fashion in skirt, jacket fronts, round or in Eton style added, and a full front of Scotch plaid surah bought. A slik jacket or jacket fronts, full vest, corselet, entire alceves or deep cuffs, skirt ruffles or border may be evolved out of a half-worn plain, glacó or striped silk and be combined with a wooden skirt and partially worn waist. Contrasts answer as well as shades of a color, but in either case barmony must be studied or the effect will not be a success.

VELVET AND VELVETEEN

THE most convenient and probably the most worn resterial for combinations will be velvet and velveteen, which curiches and agrees with every miterial in the way of silk and wooden dress-goods. Either a darker shade or a contrusting color may be used for entire sleeves, deep cuffs or short sleeve puffs, a short tacket or inched fronts. Other cores. a short jacket or jacket fronts. Other accessories are in the form of revers, pointed or full vest, collar, skirt border and panels; in fact, many are the uses to which these pile fabrics are put, and they are universally becoming. If a good velvet is beyond the means, use a good a good velvet is beyond the means, use a good relveteen, of which there are many brands. Either velvet or relveteen must be cut with the pile rouning down, and above all the pieces must be matched, cut alike by the grain of the cloth or the material will shade and wear differently. Cut a border on the exact bias for a skirt. A tiny ruffle and bias folds of velvet are also fashionable trimmings. For a dressy evening waist nothing is prettier than a velvet Eton or zonave jacket, with a bloose and full sleeves of surah, China silk or crepon, which can be worn with silk or woolen skirts of a similar or contrasting color.

If any velvet is at hand that can be renovated and used, do not hesitate about attempting the task, as it is easy to do: Fill a large-mouthed pan with boiling water, leaving it on the stove so that it will continue to boil. Two the stove so that it will continue to boil. Two persons should work together, as one holds the veivet close over the steaming water while the second one brushes the pile up with a whisk, brushing briskly against the pile. Then let it dry—do not lay anything upon it in the meantime—and if still crinkled or crushed-looking, repeat the steaming and brushing. Two attenuits will certainly feature in the relationship.

repeat the steaming and brushing. Two at-tempts will certainly freshen the velvet, and generally one will answer. Dust the velvet before steaming it.

ABOUT YOUR GLOVES

WHEN the home dressmaker has completed a gown her next thought is of the bat and gloves to accompany it. The latter does much in giving the gown a stylish air, or if the gloves be illy selected the whole garment is rulaed in the eyes of all beholders. Suéde or undressed gloves do not wear as well as glacé or dressed kid, but are still favored for dressy calling and church wear in eight botton mousquetaires, unless a four button glacé of the most expensive brands is preferred, as it often is by very conservative taste. The ordinary four button glacé glove is worn for shopping and traveling. The buttonless Biarritz glove at one dollar is very stylish for traveling and morning wear, and should fit looser than a "real" kid glove. Heavy kid gloves, piqué sewed, that is, with the raw edge lapped over and stitched down, are worn by many well-dressed women with morning costames domined before two P. M. Heavy kid gloves having tilburied or faced palms are worn for driving, with four brass buttons fastening them, Gannilet gloves of castor, undressed reindeer or heavydoe skin, often miscalled "dog-skin." are fashionable for horsewomen. White suide gloves are worn in the evening with any color, or the toilette is completed with harmonizing gloves of a delicate shade, as larender, flesh, palest of yellow, pearl, etc. Selt stitching is more stylish than black on any glove just now. Tan and gray shades lead for day wear, though some fancy shades lead for laveling fleshy WHEN the home dressmaker has comavoided unless one possesses many changes.

The lacing glove suits persons having fleshy wrists. A perfect fit does not mean a cramped appearance of the hand.

WHAT NOT TO WEAR

T is as important to know what not to wear as what to wear, and while many fashion writers, guides to beauty, etc., tell us what we should do, they are not as ready in saying what pitfalls must be avoided by every woman desiring to look as well as possible. It is possible to do this, and should be the aim of the feminine sex to dress as becomined as possible without exdress as becomingly as possible, without ex-ceeding their means, injuring health or neg-lecting home duties.

THINGS TO BE AVOIDED

MAUVE, nile green, rose pink, clear white, steely gray, yellowish tan and sky blue when of a sallow complexion. Plaids, broad stripes and light colors when short and broad stripes and light colors when short and stout in figure. Fluffy skirt trimming if under five feet four inches in height. Hairline stripes, piain skirts and flat vests when thin and slender in person. Turn-over collars when possessed of a long, thin neck. Collars without a finish in the way of a white cord, plaited ribbon, folds, etc., when of a dark or sallow complexion. Dirty white kid gloves on a rainy day or while traveling. Over-trimmed dresses and hats for traveling, also trains on traveling or tailor-made gowns. on traveling or tailor-made gowns

SKIRTS, WAISTS AND HATS

SKIN-tight bell skirt fronts with a prominent abdomen, and basques very short on the sides with very large hips.

Round waisis, square vokes, balloon sleeves and excessively tight collars when full in form. Large hats for shopping and evening wear, and black hats if of a brunctte skin, unless blessed with rosy cheecks.

The extremes in dress, as one dressing too old, too young, too plainly or too elaborately for the occasion, time and wearer's position in tife. Linen collars with a homely neck, ditto linen ouffs with dark, thin or wrinkled hands. Tightly drawn back hair with a thin face, and a high coiffure with a long head.

Brick red, emerald green, orange and yellow tan with red hair. Electric blue unless pos-sessed of a clear, rosy skin and light hair, Short-fingered gloves and too tight a fit.

Broad coat-tail backs to basques with wide ps. Poorly fitting corset under a well fitting dress. White muslin petticonts for street wear. Bordered lace veils unless they are worn below the chin, and dotted reils with weak eyes. Trailing skirts on a stormy day. Ripped or torn kid gloves at any time. A round corse-let with a short weisted figure, when a pointed one will give the desired tapering appearance. Large buttons for fastening a waist over a stout figure. Rose pink necessories with a wrinkled face or neck. Gray or navy blue face veils over a sallow complexion, when face veils over a sallow complexion, when golden brown will have the opposite effect and improve the skin. Round turbans with a full face and a peaked crown with a long or sharp-featured face.

DRESSMAKERS CORNER

Under this heading I will cheerfully answer each month any reasonable question on Home Dressmaking sent me by my readers.

EMMA M. HOOPER

Boys' MOTHER-Bend answer to "Mrs. Maggie V." JESSET DEANS—Occasionally the back of a skirt is galbered, so why not try this plan if "so tired of a bell back?"

Mat D.—Trim the evening dress with satin ribbons, unless you have a corselet of velvet, in which case use satin back velvet ribbon.

Alones—An article upon combinations appears in the October number. (2) itsel silk shirt waists, lined, will be fashionable all the winter.

Mas. D. H.—Do not dress a girl of sixteen as a young woman; she is only a miss, and will be a woman sood enough without basiculng time.

Bannina—For an ocean voyage in November you will certainly require your scalakin cost and the bemisepun dress, with a flamed wrapper for betth use.

QCREE MOTHER-Read answer to "Short Clothes."

(2) You can buy finither stitching by the yard or piece for siliching down over the raw seams of the cutton

Mas. James W.—I know of an excellent dressmakers' school, but of course they teach only one system at it; send me year address and a stamped envelope, and I will send you the address privately.

NAM MAGGIE V.—Get a reefer for the three-year-old boy. (2) Sew his kill skirt permanently to a ribbed underrease. (3) A white serge jacket suit has a biouse of white china slik for fall wear.

KATHINYN—It requires six yards of black taffeta stills for the slouplest sills petitivnat, and eight yards if you wish a cluster of marrow rutiles over the bottom one or bulgreise, as it is usually called.

PALL BRIDE—October is a favorite month for bridea.

(2) You should provide both fall and winter dresses.

(3) Two hats, a wrap for each scasor, ten gown and flannel wrapper, besides the list formished.

Lany Bryy-Your inquiries should have been directed to the Festion Department. (1) When practicable, estimate contournes for abort, stout figures will be illustrated in Test Laness' Home Journals.

Cara Rossa—This pretty name that you have "just picked up." means "bive in Rome. (2) Willow green is a soft shade similar to the onlor of the beafor the willow tree, which has almost a gray down over its surface.

BROAT CLOTHES-Put your haby in short dresses, nambric, lawn, nairmook, etc., in September, October is rather late for a first attempt of this wort. (2) Long alseves and damed for skirts and under-vests, of course.

THELLE S.—Velvet will be very fashionable in the fall for sleeves, jacket or correlet on side and woolen dresses. (2) Use a shade darker than the gray or a rich, dark shade of green that combines beautifully with steel and pinking, gray shades.

Mus. Jones D.—You have already read of the new shades in the September leave; golden and deeper browns, dark red and navy-blue you can wear. (2) Your lavorder tosagown will prove more becoming with a front of creamy-pink Japaneze silk.

Mossa F. G.—Pink is not becoming to a sallow com-plexion, but is if the skin is clear, though pale. (2) Wash-your hair caces a week in saint of hartar and water to re-move the oily feeting. Rices it twice in clear, warm water and then in cold water to avoid taking cold.

Mus. R. T. U.—The really first-class ladies' tailors do not make a walking gown to drug the streets. (2) Use velveteen binding and convex firing as usual on the skirl; the canvas must be a true bins to set eventy. (3) Little girls wear reefer jackets and Wattsau closks for the fall.

Mrs. Chas. E.—It is impossible for me to give addresses and recommend firms is these columns, as yet must see for yourself that it would be a free advertisement for the people thus quoted. Write in a personal letter, exclosing statup and address for the information desired.

C. L. S. or N. C.—Guimpe is pronounced as though spelled "gamp," (2) Your last and your sinter's are de-cidedly red. (3) For a girl of lifteen, skirts should be made to her shoe tops. (4) Navy and electric blue, gray, cream, green of a light shade, deep garnot, lavender and pale blue.

PATTE—Use the red cashmere skirt for a Russian blouse to wear with the brown and black skirts. (2) Add three tiny blas ruffles overlapping each other of darker sike, a corselet, sleaves and plastron of the meove crepon for fall evening wear. (4) Bengaline, taffeta, giaco, satin, or strah.

f. A. O.—You will have to spenge and press the Samuel dress, but if there is a taking pear you get him to do it if no, proceed as follows: Wring a wet cloth out until it cannot drip, then lay it on the right side of the fancet and iron with a lot tree suiti perfectly dry, pressing hard upon the iron.

Markon—Bress according to your looks, though there is really but very little difference between a matron of thirty-five and one of forty years. Perhaps your sider looks younger than her years, or has always dressed younger than you. (2) There is a harmless wrinkle remover, but I cannot perseably recommend any cosmotics. If you desire any addresses, send a stamped envelope, as I have stated many times pre-vious to this.

COUNTRY GIRL-Princess gowns will not be as much worn as jacket and round swists, though always in style for house customes-nowadays, with a draped front. (2) Blazers have not led their day, and such seits will be worn with lined wants until winter, though an Eton jacket sait is never. (3) A dressmaker understanding cutting and fitting does not use paper patterns. (4) Send me your address if you want to know anything of a system which you can learn at bonns.

J. Mc. F.—I am scorry that your letter arrived entirely too late to appear in a previous number of the Laurier Brass Joenana. If you have not purchased your dress get one of navy-bine or golden-brown serge and trim with a pointed girdle, deep cuffs and collar of velvet or velvesee. (3) A bell skirt, full alsernes, coat-tall bassies and break the skirt on either side with a few fields running into the bell. (3) A princess is not becoming to one having a prominent form in front.

Substitute.—You would have to enter a millinery school, or one for dressmaking, and leasn the minuse details before attempting designing. There are probably such places in Chicago, as there are in New York, but if you do not know of any write me, giving address, and I will seed you an address in New York. After a course in such schools you will find it easier to secure a post-tion than to seek one where you would have to week up from the lowest round of the ladder of success.

I. M. H.—Use black bengaline slik for deep cuffs to lengthen the velvet sleeves. (9) The draperles that will come in during the course of time will not look like those of long age. I cannot tell you how to remodel the dress miles you are willing to cut it. (9) Use the goves, a fine back and V front, with a ceeding of velvet down such seam, full velvet sleaves and a pointed baseau, allowed the place of one deep flounce have three they overlapping suffice on the skirt edge; corded revers will also add a dressy finish.

R. C. 8.—The simplest cap for a widow is a three-cornered piece of taristan with a ruche of the same around the three sides. It is worn with the point forward and has etimes of the taristan field loosely over the back of the late. (1) Navy-bine or golden-brown serge at seventy-dive cents, with consolet and deep cuffs of velyeless and eliging of iridescent blue bests at thirty-five cents. (3) Fall shows fulling over elbows, deep cuffs to writes, high collest, round waist with cornelet deep in front and narrowing to two backs in the back, or bines jacket fronts and a full very; bell skirt having an unbidd hem adliched (wice on the upper using, or a bias-garbered raffle.

COSTUMES OF EARLY AUTUMN

By Isabel A. Mallon

HE so-called tailor-made suit, in its absolute simplicity, could only be worn by could only be worn by women whose figures were absolutely perfect; as these women were few, and the tailor-made suit is most desirable, the tailor has learned to combine with it soft waistcoats, velvet or fur, or even to put upon it what might be called veritable trimmings. Still, be is elever enough never to permit it to lose its tailor-made appearance, that is, through perfection of pressing, through care as to the lining, and a willingness to fit and refit the tailor-made suit makes it bear a mark as positive as that of sterling silver.

In fitting a cloth suit, the modes of fitting peculiar to the tailor are many in number, but good in result. The measurements are numerous. The first faiting is an ordinary content.

good in result. The measurements are numer-ous; the first fitting is an ordinary cutton lining; the second one a silk lining, the third one the silk and the material, the fourth one the almost finished bodice, which usually needs then only a few mistakes rectified, and there is the finished bodice for the head tailor to see in its entirety. No critic is so severe as there is the finished bodice for the head tailor to see in its entirety. No critic is so severe as is the master of the establishment, and a alight wrinkle will cause him to order the taking apart of the bodice and the making it so that it fits like the proverbial glove; the same care is shown in fitting a skirt, and at the really good tailor's a long train cloth skirt, unless it were for evening or house wear, is not even considered.

SOME OF THE NEW MATERIALS

A MONG the prettiest of the new materials for the cloth gowns are those showing very light backgrounds with hair lines or checks of a darker shade upon them. The checks of a darker shade upon them. The hair lines are rather newer, and are almost invariably seen on a smooth surfaced cloth. White is shown with a hair line of dark brown, dark blue, gray, purple and, oddly enough, emerald green. The checks are in blue and white, brown and white, bluck and white, blue and green, gray and black, brown and white, brown and mode, and are in both smooth cloths and rough cheviots. The latter, by the by, I can personally comsonsily com-mend for general street wear, as a well-made suit of it has visited the cleaner's seveml seasons and expects to be worn still another.

Plain dark blue cloth combined with dark green cloth is a combination that is obtaining, and as the shades used are those in the green and blue plaid familiar to us all they really harmonize very well. Sometimes the green trimming is of the cloth and some-times of vel-vet. It is vet. It is effective when the velvet is used. Every woman should know -that is, every woman wholiasgiven that soft velwet is the most becomtrimmings.

THE NEWEST COSTUME dittes, No. 11

A BLUE AND GREEN COSTUME

THE costume that suggests the Russian bloose, and yet lacks its unshapely and untidy air, is shown in Illustration No. 1. The skirt is of blue cloth with a broad band of skirt is of blue cloth with a broad band of dark green velvet about the lower edge. The blouse is laid in three full box plaits from the neck down; that however, do not flare, and it is confined at the walst with a pointed girdle of velvet that hooks just in the center and by its point accentantes the waist line. The siegves are full ones of the cloth drawn in at the wrist to a velvet band and having cap allower reaching nearly to the cloth, and decosleeves reaching nearly to the elbow, and deco-rated in the same way. The bonnet is a small, close-fitting one of blue felt, having just in front an Alsatian bow of green velvet, while green velvet ties are knotted under the chin. The wearer having a rosy complexion dares assume a green veil of fine net, dotted with chemille. The gloves are the usual dark tan ones that accord with everything, are of heavy kid and closed with four large buttons. This costome may be cited as one that could be made by a dressmaker as well as a tailor, for there is no absolute plain surface that requires the heavy hand of the manly presser, or the critical eye of the autocrat of the fitting room.

THE PLAINEST OF SUITS

A FROCK that is the acme of simplicity is shown in Illustration No. 2. It is made of brown and white cheviot, the skirt, carefully fitted, is without a wrinkle and untrimmed, the beauty of the gown depending entirely on the perfection of its make and the smart air of the bodice and waistcoat. The waistcoat is of brown and white striped material fitted closely to the figure, buttoned all the way down before by bullet buttons of pearl and leaving a high collar of the same material. This is made exactly like a gentleman's waistcoat with the exception that hones are run from the side seams over tion that lones are run from the side seams over the stomach to keep it in position. There are no sleeres, and the back is of white muslin. The waist-coat is separate from the skirt and coaf, and so made, that if necessary, it can be sent to the cleanage in made, that if necessary, it can be sent to the cleaners. The coat is of the check cheviot, fits closely in the back and is semi-fitting in front, with a shawl collar and revers faced with plain sitk. The sleeves are raised on the shoulders and layer deep, turned are raised on the shoulders and have deep turned back cuffs of the silk. The bounct is one that in-clines to the poke shape; it is of brown felt with a knot of feathers tied on at the back and has the strings looped under the chin. Such a costume is one of which neither the one of which neither the wearer nor the looker on will tire, and it may, of course, be made up in any cloth fancied, though the result is especially good when the coat and skirt when the coat and skirt show a tiny check and the waistcoat a hair line.

Everybody asks me "But what do you think about it yourself?" Well, we all learn from experience is, that while in cloth gowns the solid color may be the most becoming, the check or stripe will wear best, clean best and not grow shiny. A cloth suit grown shiny is not grow skiny. A cloth suit grown shiny is an extremely disreputable object, so be wise and choose the funcy stuffs.

SOME OF THE QUESTIONS

A QUESTION that is often asked is as to the propriety of wearing a bonnet with a tailor-made suit. Of this there can be no doubt, provided always that the bonnet is a simple one. A large picture hat is decidedly out of taste with a cloth gown, but a neat close-fitting bonnet seems as much a part of the trig get-up as does the stiff hat which, after all, few women find becoming.

The wearing of much jewelry with a cloth gown is always in bad taste, and though the watch is counted a necessity it is considered in best taste to keep it out of sight. The four button gloves with their heavy pique seams, loose of fit and closing with four large buttons are in better taste for wear with a cloth frock than are the thin undressed kid gloves specially suited to wear with more elaborate gowns. QUESTION that is often asked is as to

A CLOTH, VELVET AND SILK BODICE

THE ingenuity of the tailor in combining materials with a plain cloth bodice is shown in the use of cloth, velvet and slik, each one being so placed that, while it forms an absolute contrast to the other, never takes away from the simplicity of the style. In Illustration No. 3 is nichtered such a combinalastration No. 3 is pictured such a combina-tion. A closely-fitted coat of dark brown cloth baving its edges bound with a narrow velvet ribbon flares away in front to show an ècru silk shirt, and below it a high pointed girdle of dark brown velvet. The shirt has for its edge finish the pretty soft frill which even the most general use cannot make tire-some. The girdle is laced in the back, so that it is possible to make it fit perfectly. The high collar is of the silk: the sleeves, slightly raised on each shoulder, shape into the arm and fit rather closely, having as their finish a fold of the silk. The hat is an Alpine one of brown felt with three bands of light leather about it, and a bunch of cock's feathers standing up at one side.

ABOUT SOMETHING ELSE

THE fact that the girdle of this costume is laced in the back to make it set well proves what dressmakers have always said, that this mode of closing a gown is more cer-tain to result in a perfectly fitting bodice than any other. Of course it is troublesome, for if one does not have a maid then it is necessary for does not have a maid then it is necessary for the most patient and willing member of the family to do the lacing. But that the result is desirable cannot be denied. For an evening dress the lacing in the back is especially com-mended, and the tailor schiom falls to make his cloth gowns, those of white, pink, yellow or whatever the faint shade may be, it this fashion. Do not make the mistake of ever getting the lacing to a bodies so different in shade that it becomes conspicuous, but rather to secure one that shall be a perfect match. to secure one that shall be a perfect match.

Just remember that it is simply the mode of closing, and not a decoration, so that you do not wish to draw attention to it.

ABOUT THE PLAIDS

TAILORS are showing very gorgeous plaid stuffs—that is gorgeous in color and good and heavy in material. The blue and green, with a slight yellow line across it, will, it is more than probable, be most popular. As it will be worn with either a blue or green it will be worn with either a blue or green cost, and a fancy waistcost in harmony with this. Another combination like to obtain is a mingling of dull red and warm brown; a very smart suit made of this has a close fitting skirt of the plaid with a double-breasted jacket of brown velvetine that shows where it turns away in front a waistcoat of brown cloth stripped with scarlet. With this is worn a soft brown felt hat decorated only with a double alsatian bow of broad red ribbon. Wise women, whether they are tall and slender, or short and stout, choose that the plaid should only be used for the skirt, as the figure that can wear a plaid bodice is a very exceptional one. Among the cloths are combinations of brown and green, of are combinations of brown and green, of heather and green, of green and black, of three or four of these colors altogether; indeed there are more varieties of the plaid stuffs than there are alone in secret plans in stock.

The silk lining which I have always commended is arranged this season very often almost as a very onten almost as a silk petticont, often being only fastened to the top of the skirt, and some-times not having even that connection with it. The advantage or disadvantage of this must be decided by the wearer herself; personally, while I do not care for a lining to act as if it were gived to the skirt, still I rather fancy it being caught here and there so that the consciousness of a firm foursciousness of a firm foundation makes me quite easy. The skirt lining, though it may be of silk, does not need to be of a heavy quality, and as it adds such an air of chic to the gown, makes it set better and gives to one-self a delightful sensation of luxury, I must com-mend it. It is not related that the wise woman of many years ago trou-bled berself about silk lin-to-day is she who, when a silk skirt has done its duty, rips it carefully spart, brushes and mends it, and keeps it for a lining for her cloth, or indeed, any gown. The pink gathered frill about the bottom may be of new silk.

ACME OF SIMPLICITY (Illus. No. 2)

HOW TO WEAR A CLOTH GOWN

THERE is an art in wearing a tailor-made gown. The best of tailors may fit you perfectly, and yet by your mode of walking or sitting the good effect may be entirely lost. If your gown is dedicated to the street do not sit around the house in it, for it will lose its shape about the hips, and even when you do wear it at bome, or in paying a call, sit up straight, for it is fitted to certain lines and curves of your body, those that are correct, and will become shapeless if you attempt to distort it by pulling it where it ought not to be. Always draw in your belt and fasten it.

never makes a belt very tight, for it is intended to draw the bodice in place rather than squeeze it in. fitted. You pay for good work, and until your gown fits you as it should it is the business of the maker to rectify the defects. Women are inclined to overlook faults in work because they do not want to seem disagresable, and the result is that the world is flooded with poor workers, whereas if you make it the practice of your life to pay well, to insist upon good work, you will obtain not only what you desire but the thanks of millions of other women.

THE SMALL BELONGINGS OF DRESS

By Isabel A. Mallon

MRS. MALLON will be glad to answer any question about woman's wear which may be sent to her by JOURNAL readers. She asks, however, that she be permitted to answer through this Department in the JOURNAL; though, if stamps are inclosed, she will reply by mail. Address all letters to MRS. MALLON, care of THE LADRES' HOME JOURNAL, Philadelphia, Pa.

ARDLY anybody would think of counting brushes among the s mall belongings of dress. And yet they are most decidedly. No gown looks well that is not prop-erly brushed, and euch material demands a different kind of material demands a different kind of brush to cause the dust to fly from it. For the cloth or wool gown a short stiff whisk, or a long stiff brush, is of most use. For velvet, a long brush with soft fine hairs will most quickly take away the bloom of time, and will not remove the rich pile. For black silk, satin, or any of the silky stuffs a perfectly flat brush made of thick plush is most desirable. With the whisk on the cloth short, quick strokes should be given, strokes that send the dust flying away; on the velvet or silk a gentler stroke is required, and in brushing velvet, especially, care must be taken to brush with the pile and not against it, which means, of course, the brushing up, as a good dressmaker always makes velvet in that way. On seal skin, or any fur, no brush is a good dressmaker always makes revet in that way. On seal skin, or any fur, no brush is required; instead, a thorough shaking should be given. These seem like little things, but as they go to make your toilette sweet and complete they are among the most important of the small belongings of dress.

MATERIAL that will be favored for tea A MATERIAL that will be favored for tea gowns or house dresses during the winter is white alpaca. Under its lining of white silk comes another one of very thin finnnel, so that while it has the desired swish of the silk it gains a gracefulness from the woolen lining that would never come to it in woolen lining that would never come to it in any other way.

Oftenest these house gowns are cut out at the neck in the modest English fashion and finished with a deep frill of lace. Although it would seem as if this fall of lace had been so much worm during the summer that it was out of vogue, still it must be remembered that it is becoming, and when the lace used is good by a always in fushion. In the old picture it is always in fashion. In the old picture books we see that good Queen, Victoria of England, wearing just such a bodice, and with a rose on one side of her glossy hair, which, as is the fashion of to-day, is parted just down the center.

THE turned-over linen collar and deep cuffs to match are fancied by women who wenr close-fitting cloth or suiting gowns. While they are decidedly trying, they have in their air of immaculate whiteness something that is indescribable, but which mankind, who very much admires them, can only call very fetching.

POR those who do not know the technical term of the seams of gloves it may be said that the ordinary close seam is simply called "drawing them together;" "cable" seams are on those gloves that have a different colored thread from the glove and they are over-handed, while the ploue seams lap over each other and are sewn through and through. These latter, by the by, are oftenest noticed on the heavy kid glove with its four buttons, intended for wear on the street with a tailor-made gows. made gown.

THE very heavy Russian pattern is now shown in white veiling. A year ago in Paris it was also shown in pale rose color, which is much more becoming than the white, but few, because of its oddity, have had the courage, even when they possessed it, to put it ou

THE early autumn will see a novelty in shoes that is between the low shoe of the summer and the patent leather one of the winter. It is the laced one made of undressed Russian leather. Delightfully soft to wear, it yet protects the ankles from the chilly winds, and is most dressy to look at. The red Romeo shoe divided in the center and having no heel has been, in the past, dedicated to gentlemen for house wear, but an enterprising shoemaker has discovered that they look pretty and pichas discovered that they look pretty and pic-turesque on the feminine foot in the house, and so they are offered for this purpose.

CAPE that will have general wear during A. the early autumn is made of Scotch plaid, reaches well below the waist, fits into the back and has a hood lined with plush or velvet, the color chosen being that which is most conspicuous in the plaid.

THE woman who can make her bonnet can afford to be very vain of the accomplishment, for the pretty, babylike affairs worn by her royal sweetness, the Princess of Wales, are all the result of her own deft fingers. The Queen of Denmark herself has a decided lean-ing toward millinery and taught each one of her daughters this art, for, after all, the concep-tion of the beautiful bonnet is an art.

PASHION in perfume seems curious, and A PASHION in perfume seems curious, and yet if you ask the women who set the styles they will tell you that English rose, violet and Jessemine are given the preference. This is because the odors are dainty without their being heavy. Wise nurses or mothers never permit in a sick room any perfume save that which is extracted from the fir tree, and which, beside being pleasant and healthful in odor, is said to be health-giving in its properties.

QUEEN MARGUERITE of Italy has received on each festival day a perfect pearl, until her collection of the pure white stones consists of ropes of pearls that reach to her waist. This has made it fashionable for each loving bridegroom to give to his bride a string of the milk-like jewels.

I F your figure is slender do not hesitate to A arrange about it a broad sash with a very large resette close to the front. The fashionable tailors say such an arrangement only tends to bring out your girlish figure more than ever.

PINK butiste is liked for night-dresses. It may be made in the simplest fashion, trimmed around the neck and front with a ruffle of the same, or it may be elaborately decorated with white lace and soft pink ribbons. Among the most curious patterns in laces for underwear, one that is really odd, has for its pattern, above the scallop, a stiff, straight apple tree in full bloom.

LARGE, soft felt hats, not unlike the Leg-horn ones worn during the summer, bid fair to be popular during the winter. They are dedicated to receptions, or rather dressy affairs where a hat can be worn, and are trimmed, not with feathers, but with velvet flowers tinted to look like the very natural

SPEAKING of hats, it may be mentioned that the black felt will be also in vogue, but it will be so hidden under bright flowers and loops of white ribbon that its somber shade will be quite overlooked.

FOR wear over the going-away gown the fashionable tailor recommends a long, blue cloth ulster, lined with silk of the same shade and buttoned, like old Grimes' coat, all down before. This is sufficiently quiet to hide the going-away gown, and it makes the sensitive woman conscious of the fact that every-body does not recognize her as a bride.

THE Watteny effect continues to be liked, I not only for house wear, but for evening dresses, and no gown is considered too elaborate with such an arrangement.

THE old-time bow is again seen on the slipper. It is at its prettiest when made of heavy satin ribbon and placed on a velvet slipper. Then one feels that the little feet can peep in and out, for they are most beautifully dressed.

VERY elaborate cloak intended for wear A at the opera is a lavender gros grain with a bood of white lace. Its elaboration makes it impossible for wear at any small affair.

T is whispered that the Greek knot, with its I is winspered into the oreck kind, with its ribbon about it, is only the forerunner of the old-finshioned chignon or waterfall. One hopes most curnestly that this is not true, for if there ever was an ugly fashion of dressing the hair it was this. Just now, when everybody wears the hair in a manner most becoming there are more prefit wangen than there ing, there are more pretty women than there ever were before, and certainly this ought to be reason enough to keep the ugly fashion away.

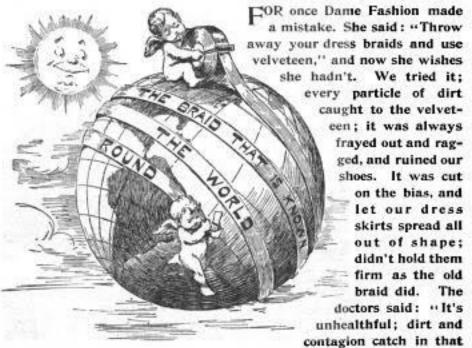

BY the by, speaking of jewelry, it may be mentioned that the bracelot set with a watch is in extremely bad form, and the woman who has the best taste wears her watch where it will be the least observed.

THE gentlemanly get-up, that is, the one showing the cloth skirt, regulation shirt and flare-away coat bids fair to be in vogue all the winter. Certainly as absolute daintiness is the necessity for this it must be commended. The ugly suspenders will die with the summer sun. Womankind never assumed anything that was quite so masculine or quite so ungraceful as these articles; they made her figure look badly, and they certainly did not make her look more a woman. make her look more a woman.

WOMEN who do not go abroad are now WOMEN who do not go abroad are now accommodated by the Paristan dress-makers in a special way. That is, they send over the exact photograph of the gown, giving both the back and front view, and telling exactly what the combinations are in which the costume may be developed. For my own part, I do not believe in encouraging this, as I think there are a number of good dressmakers in America who, if they were better patronized, would in time gain that curious something, best called chic, which attaches itself to a French composition in velvets or silks.

THE combinations of lavender and blue, and of blue and green, of which I have spoken before, are going to have a very decided vogue this fall; and yet, unless a great deal of care is taken in the arrangement of the colors, the effects produced will be more than merely inbarmonious, they will be absolutely ugly, English women especially are affecting the skirt and cutawny coat of dark blue cioth, with a shirt or waistcoat of lavender silk.

THE new vails, those of black brussels net. L with white flowers or figures upon them, have only the advantage of nevelty, for they are originally not becoming even to the most velveteen." And now Fashion says: "Your grandmothers knew what they were about; take back your Goff dress braids that have been the standard all these years." And now we will buy the braid that is worth more than velveteen, and costs less, and comes in 130 shades to match all the fashionable dress goods.

Dress Stylishly.

If you desire to dress stylishly one of the things that is most necessary is a perfect-fitting, well-made closk or wrap. When purchashing a closk or wrap, there are four points to be considered; you wish a stylish garment, it must fit nicely, the quality must be good, and the price must be reasonable.

How can you get a garment of this kind? Only by having one made to order—and that is where we can add you. We are manufacturers of closks and wraps, and by selling direct to you we save you the jobber's and retailer's peofits. We cut and make every garment to order, thus insuring a perfect-fitting and nicely finished closk, and no matter where you live we pay the express charges.

THE BABY'S LAYETTE

By Isabel A. Mallon

WOMAN is something less than a woman who does not find the greatest charm pos-sible in the outlit, or layette, of a buby. The little clothes, so dainty and so preatily fashioned, all the tray be-longings waiting for the lit-about these constiting that tle stranger, have about them something that seems to cause all the motherhood in one to rise in the heart. Nothing is too good for the haby. Nothing is too good for this little stranger who, when he comes, reigns supremely over the best of all kingdoms—a mother's heart. Nothing can be too fine and delicate for this king who, not reigning over his father, yet evokes that most attractive of emotions—

But it is to his mother that the wee baby is But it is to his mother that the wee oney is dearest; when he gets so he can look and talk and say words that to him are a special lan-guage which the fond papa believes that he can understand, then he gets to be of interest to mankind, but before that he simply seems a fanny little bundle at which a father may look with peide, but of which he has a certain fear. So for a few mouths baby is essentially mather's and as he sleeps in her arms and she fear. So for a few months bady is essentially mother's, and as he sleeps in her arms and she realizes his littleness, his weakness and his realizes his littleness, his weakness and his implicit confidence in her, she draws him a bit closer, leans over and kisses the pink little face and whispers: "God bless you all the day, and God keep you all the night."

THE BABY'S WARDROBE

THE woman who has learned to do fine sewing gives a thanksgiving for it when the time comes for her to prepare the layette for the little baby who is coming. She knows that the most aristocratic buby of to-day has no lace on his frock, is not weighted down with heavy embroideries, but instead has all his clothes benutifully decorated with hemstitching and fine drawn work and this it stitching and fine drawn work, and this it gives her intense pleasure to do. Each stitch set in means so much love and so much hope, and the little gowns themselves become mute expressions of her happiness.

For the baby's frocks nainsook, or cambric, is usually chosen, a preference being given to the first, as it is so much softer. Little silk frocks are shown, but a refined taste rather hints at their inappropriateness, and the clear white nainsook is preferred. For very simple little gowns, that is, those finished with a plain hem and a few tucks done by hand, cambric is generally used, nainsook forming the finer and more elaborately wrought dresses, while the very sheerest of it is used for the christening robe. A very delightful haby who came as a Christmas gift had in his wardrobe six cambric gowns, six nainsook ones and his christening robe. The nainsook ones were made with either round or square yokes of hemstitch or drawn work, while the christening robe last what seemed like a little bodice formed of Valenciennes insertion alternating with drawn work. The tiny collar was a frill of the same lace, and the little sleeves had deep cuffs like the bodice. The skirt had two rows of lace insertion and two of drawn work, and then came the hem, which was the finish to it. Other designs for an elaborate dress show round or square jacket outlines set into the yoke. The petitiont worm with this dress is of nairwork made claborate with drawn frocks are shown, but a refined taste rather the yoke. The petticoat worn with this dress is of nainsook, made elaborate with drawn work, while the flannel one has white satin ribbon alternating with a lace, and lace frill as

HIS OTHER BELONGINGS

A FTER his honor, the baby, has had his both and been powdered and made to feel as if life was indeed worth living, then he is dressed. He first puts on either his fine flannel band, or, if mamma profers it, there is slipped over his head the knitted silk one that takes its place. The flannel band has for its finish, at the top and bottom, a row of fine feather stitching done with linen floss; of these he possesses six; next comes his little shirt which is of linen, finished either with a frill of real baby lace, which is about a third of an inch wide, or better still a tiny scallop finely embroidered. By the by, you must remember that everything must be perfectly smooth, otherwise the tender flesh will be irritated. Six little shirts are the number that FTER his honor, the baby, has had his tated. Six little shirts are the number that this autocrat of the nursery requires. Then come his flannel petticoats; these will be very simply made, a narrow embroidery outlining the edge or a simple feather stitching taking its place. He will have four of these, and the one elaborate petticuat to be worn with his christening robe. Of white petticoats there will be six, and where natusook is not used I advise cambric in preference to cotton; there is not more than a couple of pennies difference in the price and it is wider; these are very the hand sewing upon them making them; beautiful.

THE WRAPPERS AND COATS

THE prettiest of wrappers is made of fine bedford cord in blue and white or pink and white; it is either shirred or tucked with feather stitching of silk at the neck, and then instead of a hem all the edges are bound with satin ribbon the color of the stripe. A round little collar bound with ribbon, and sleeves with order matching the value gives a maint. little collar bound with ribbon, and sleeves with cuffs matching the yoke, give a quaint appearance to the little garment and add to its beauty. The plain flannel wrappers are, however, liked by many, and are noted in pale pink or blue, and that delicate shade of grey which seems dedicated to such little people.

The coat or cloak is usually of white cashmere, silk or a light weight cloth, sometimes instead of white the grey shade being chosen. There is not much change in design, for they continue to be smocked at the neck to form a continue to be smocked at the neck to form a circular yoke, and some few have a broad ribbon coming around the waist and confining it slightly. The simplest of little caps is preferred, those made of material like the cloak and fitting the bead closely like a Puritan cap, or if the weather be very warm those of shirted lawn being chosen. Just remember when the baby starts out in his coach that his eyes are not used to the strong light of the smashine, and so fasten around his cap one of the long white veils that come over from France, and which spread out in the French fashion give to his lordship an air of concealing his charms from a world that might be dazzled by them. continue to be smocked at the neck to form a dazzled by them.

WHEN THE BABY IS ASLEEP

T HOPE that when the baby goes to sleep he rests in an iron bed painted, not on rockers, but on strong legs; that he has in there a couch, that, while it is soft is not made of feathers, but instead of fine curled hair; this little mattress must be taken out and aired every day, or in-deed every time after the buby has had a nap. The tiny pillow should have its alip benestitched and "Baby" del-icately embroidered in one corner, and his sheets should be finished in the same manner. The trimming of his white bed is usually a frill of white lace with a quille of colored ribbon above it, while at the foot is a ribbon bow of many loops and ends that fall far down. Here in the plainest of night-dresses, made of cambric, does the little gentleman sleep undicted and by such that the little gentleman sleep undicted and by such that the little gentleman sleep undicted and by such that the little gentleman sleep undicted and by such that the little gentleman sleep undicted and by such that the little gentleman sleep undicted and the such that the little gentleman sleep undicted and the such that the little gentleman sleep undicted and the such that the little gentleman sleep undicted and the such that the little gentleman sleep undicted and the such that the little gentleman sleep undicted and the such that the little gentleman sleep undicted and the such that the such tha disturbed by pins that prick or buttons that rub. The soft pink, blue or white blanket, light and fleecy as possible, is bound with rib-bon, and has his title embroidered on it. Bythe by, these blankets are often among the presents sent to happy mothers. A pretty one is of white bound with pale blue, having em-broidered in the corner in blue a bunch of forget-me-note, thei with a narrow white rib-bon which is really ribbon appliqued as it would be if a bow were tied. Then below this in quaint lettering is embrosidered;

"Shut, little eyes, and shut in the blue; Sleep, little baby, God forms you."

Some have simply the word "rest" upon them, others have "lie still and slumber." The bed is always white, and the pink or pale blue, so exclusively the baby colors, show very daintily against it.

THE BABY'S HAMPER

THE round haby basket has had its day, and in its place is found the dignified looking hamper enameled in white and having inside of it a lining formed of soft silk suchets redolent with orris root. In the lower part every thing required for the baby when he is first dressed is are the things that go to help make his toles. There is the chinas and toles. There is the chinas and point and toles. a partition so that the soap and the sponge are sepa-rated, there is the silver or ivory back-ed brush, the tiny little comb. the book with flannel leaves filled with dozens of safety pins of all different sizes one or two silk towels, the powder box and post, the soft linen wash rags and two wash rags and two or three pairs of the they knitted socks that are to be put on the little feet that have never touched earth be-fore. Usually these small belongings are presents, and so the choice of silver or china boxes and cups must be left to the giver. After the hamper is all filled the lid may be put down and strapped with a broad satin ribbon having up-on it in letters of gold that sweetest of admonitions: "Sing, beart, thou art young and the world is in blos-

A BABY'S COMPORTABLE WKAPPER

The weighing basket is not as generally known here as it is on the other side. It is assually elaborately trimmed, and while there is in it a soft silk mattress upon which the baby may rest it is used after that first test as to whether the buby weighs five or twenty pounds for the toilet basket. An illustration of the weighing basket and a full description of it was given in the JOURNAL of November, 1891, it being the one sent from across the water to the little niece of Ruth Ashmore. water to the little meee of Ruth Ashmore.
After each little gown has had all the stitches put into it, after it is certain that the deft fingers cannot make the garments of the king any more beautiful, then they should be done up in packages and tied with either pink or blue ribbons, while between the garments should be tiny linen sachets filled with orris root and having their ends fringed. It costs very little meany to set the two or three very little money to get the two or three pieces of narrow ribbon to tie the dainty bundles together, and they look and are so much prettier and daintier than when they are simply folded away one at a time. The people who make a specialty of manufacturing tine baby clothes seldom have them washed.

THE LAST FEW WORDS

It is your baby or mine, but whosever it is, I say God bless it, and make it happy. It is in your power to help; are you going to do it? The little things in our arms are babies for only a very short while, then they are boys and girls, but from the minute the baby is taken into its mother's arms and drinks of its mother's milk it imbibes the goodness or evil that is in her. Cross and ill-tempered yourself, you make your haby so; full of happiness and the good-nature that is making the best of everything, means having a bonny baby that is more than a mere well-spring of the best of everything, means having a bonny baby that is more than a mere well-spring of pleasure. And before the baby comes. For its sake think of the good people in the world, think of the virtue in the world and cultivate in yourself every good quality, every sweet-ness, for the baby's sake. It may be hard to do. There may be times when even the thought of the little one coming does not seem encouragement enough; then you must remember a Holy Baby, born centuries ago, and realize that to you as well as to His Mother there will be not only the pain but the pleasure, and that in becoming a mother you are honored among women. Pray God to make you strong and well, and when you are a little down cast go and look at the dainty little dresses, fondle the pretty basket and look into the little bed until in i magi nation you may see "beneath its coverlet a little sleeping head." That will cheer you up, and then when the baby is your very own, when it is close to you, when your arms are about it, and its little head is resting on your breast, you will only remember the happiness, you will only think of the joy, and you will feel like tiny Tim, as if you would like to ask the God above to think not only of you and yourking but of all the women and children in the world. That is what motherhood does for a womanit makes ber diving-

CULINARY HINTS AND SUGGESTIONS

Some Very Appetizing Dishes as Described by Experienced Cooks

FOR BREAKFAST OR FOR TEA

BY ANNA ALEXANDER CAMERON

OME one has said that the test of a good cook is the manner in which she can make toost, both sides browned alike. Others have claimed that good bread mak ing is a cook's most useful requirement; certainly it is an essential one. But the art of making delicious muttins for breakfast, or biscuits for tea, is not to be lightly considered, and it is in the hope that this art may be assisted that the few following receipts are given:

TO MAKE DELICIOUS MUFFINS

CREAM until very light one large table—spoonful of butter. Break six freels eggs, separating the yolks and whites. Put the yolks with the butter and beat until very light, Beat the whites to a stiff froth. Have ready one quart of fresh milk, and one light quart of sifted flour. Add the flour and milk in small quantities alternately to the butter and egg yolk, stirring it in thoroughly. Stir in a level teaspoonful of sait, and last of all the egg whites, which must be whipped into the batter gently. The stove must be hot, the muffin pans well greased, and the muffins baked immediately and sent to the table on hot plates the minute they are done.

POTATO JOHNAY CAKES.

POTATO JOHNNY CAKES

VERY good bread for breakfast or ten is A Irish potato Johanny cake. But to have it in perfection you must follow the directions exactly, and use quick dispatch in making it. Peel carefully and boil as many Irish potatoes as will make a quart when they are mashed. Put them on to boil in time to be perfectly Put them on to bool in time to be persectly done just when you are ready to use them. Have ready one quart of sifted flour, into which two gills of sweet, pure lard has been rubbed. Add one teaspoonful of salt.

Cream the potatoes quickly until perfectly smooth, then put them at once with the flour and mix with sweet milk into a pliable dough. Divide the dough in half, mold into oblong pieces and roll out about sixteen inches long and four wide. Put the Johany cake in a stew pan and set in a well-heated oven. Bake a nice brown and serve on heated plates. But-ter well and eat immediately. This broad is velvety, tender and very nice.

SPANISH BUNS FOR TEA

QUARTER of a pound of butter, one teacupful of cream, three-quarters of a J.A. teacupful of cream, three-quarters of a pound of flour, three heaping teaspoonfuls of baking powder, balf a pound of sugar, four eggs, and three teaspoonfuls of almond water. Sift the buking powder with the flour. Beat the eggs light separately. Cream sugar and butter together; add the beaten egg yolk. Stir in the cream and flour and egg white alter-nately. Stir in well the three teaspoonfuls of almond water. Bake in a buttered pan and cut in squares. cut in squares.

THE FAVORITE NAPLES BISCUIT

O'NE pound of very fine sugar, one pound of flour sifted several times and dried, one dozen eggs and one tenspoonful of finely pounded mace. Beat the yolks and whites separately very light. Add the sugar to the yolks and beat well. Then add the whites alternately with the flour. Bake a light brown and sift white ware every them. and sift white sugar over them.

LIGHT AND DAINTY CRACKERS

TAKE a piece of well-risen light bread dough about the size of a half-pint cup. Work into it a piece of fresh butter the size of a welnut. When it is all worked in, break the dough into bits as large as a nutmeg. Flour the board well and roll very thin, Prick with a fork all over and bake quickly a pule brown. It not scoret them in the least, These crackers are entirely different from those made with unrisen dough, and are especially nice for an invalid who has wearied of the taste of other bread.

HOW TO MAKE SCOTCH CAKES

TWO quarts of flour sifted with a tenspoonful of salt. One cup of fresh, good yeast, three cups of fresh milk and three eggs. Mix three-fourths of the flour (three pints) into a batter with the eggs, milk and yeast and beat tatter with the eggs, inix and yeast and beat it well. Into a clean, dry tin bucket sprinkle half of the remaining pint of flour; over this pour the batter. Sprinkle lightly over it the remainder of the flour and set it by to rise, Do this about dark, and at nine oclock the batter will have risen up through the flour. Empty the contents of the bucket into a tray bowl and mix and kneed it well. Put it back into the bucket and let it rise uptil morning. sows and mix and knead it well. Put it back into the bucket and let it rise until morning. Then work into the dough a large tablespoon-ful of nice butter. Mold into large sized circuit, flatten with the rolling pin to nearly an inch in thickness. Grease a pan and put them in to rise again; when light bake in a quick oven and serve at once. A delicious bread for breakfast.

QUICK CREAM BISCUITS

TWO cupfuls of sifted flour, half a capful of I. cream, two tenspoonfuls of baking powder, one of sugar, a tiny pinch of salt. Mix the flour, angar, and and baking powder together; then add the cream and one well-beaten erg, mixing all together with a silver knife. Handle the dough as little as possible while making it into small round cakes. Bake in a beat case, for about the minutes. This in a hot oven for about ten minutes. I quantity will make about a dozon biscuits.

GOODIES OF A BY-GONE AGE

BY FANNIE L. FANCHER

SHERE is no gainsaying that our grausinsothers really employed differ-ent methods in their cooking, hence there is some reason for the complaints we often hear that modern cooking is not equal to that of the past. Sodan and baking powders being then comparatively unknown, yeasts necessarily entered largely into their cuisine.

An elderly woman told me that she well remembered seeing her mother manufacture her own alkali from the ashes of burnt com-

Having fallen heir to a cook book which was published half a century since, I will copy, for THE LADIES HOME JOURNAL, a few of these "old-time" receipts, that those yearning for a taste of "goodies" of a generation or more ago may be gratified.

HOW THEY MADE JUMBLES

STIR together till light of color a pound of sugar and half the weight of butter, then add eight eggs beaten to a froth, rose water to the taste, and flour to make them sufficiently stiff to roll out. Roll them out in powdered sugar until about half an inch thick. Cut into strips about half an inch wide and four inches long. Join the ends together so as to form rings. Lay them on flat tims that have been buttered; bake them in a quick oven.

BANNOCKS OF PLEASANT MEMORY

STIR to a cream a pound and a quarter of brown sugar and a pound of butter. Beat six eggs, mix them with the sugar and butter; add a teaspoonful of cinnamon or ginger. Stir in a pound and three-quarters of white Indian mesi and a quarter of a pound of wheat flour. (The meal should be sifted.) Bake in small cups and let it remain in them till cold.

THOSE FAVORITE WHIGS

M IX half a pound of sugar with six ounces of butter, a couple of beaten eggs, a teaspoonful of cinnamon. Stir in two pounds of wheat flour, a teacupful of yeast and milk sufficient to make a thick batter. When light bake them in small cups.

NUT CAKES WHEN WE WERE CHILDREN

HEAT a pint of milk just lukewarm.
Stir into it a teacupful of lard. (The lard should be melted.) Stir in flour till it is a thick batter, then add a small teacupful of yeast. Set it in a warm place. When light, work in two tescupfuls and a half of rolled sugar, four eggs besten to a froth, two tea-spoonfuls of cinnamon and one of salt. Knead in flour to make it sufficiently stiff to roll out; keep in a warm place till risen again. When it appears of a spongy lightness roll it out about half an inch thick. Cut into cakes with a wine glass; let them remain fifteen or twenty minutes before boiling them. Boll them in a pot with about a couple pounds of lard. The fat should be not enough to boil up as they are put in, and a brisk fire kept up as they are put in, and a brisk fire kept under the pot.

It should be kept boiling and sinken constantly. Only a few should be boiled at once; if crowded they will not fry well. If you wish to have them nice dip them into powdered white sugar as soon as fried. The same lard, with a little more added, will suswer to fry several batches of cakes in if not burnt,

THE SUGAR DROPS OF OUR GRANDMOTHERS

STIR to a cream three ounces of butter, six of powdered white sugar; then add three beaten eggs, half a pound of sifted flour, half of a nutureg. Drop this mixture by the large spoonful onto buttered plates several inches apart. Sprinkle small sugar plums on the top, and bake them directly.

THE COMFITS WE WELL REMEMBER

MIX a pound of white sugar with just sufficient water to make a thick syrup When the sugar has dissolved drop in a pound of coriander seed, then drain off the syrup and put the seeds in a sieve with two or three and put the seeds in a sieve with two of three ounces of flour. Shake them well in it, then set them where they will dry. When dry put them in the symp again; repeat the above pro-cess till they are of the size you wish.

SAVOY CAKES OF OLDEN TIME

BEAT eight eggs to a froth, the whites and yolks should be beaten separately them mixed together, add a pound of powdered white sugar stirred in gradually. Beat the whole well together for eight or ten minutes, and the restricted of add the grated rind of a fresh lemon and half the juice, a pound of sifted floor and a couple of tablespoonfuls of coriander seed. Drop this mixture, by the large spoonful, on but-tered baking plates several inches apart, sift white sugar over them and bake immediately in a spick but not a forestable hat area in a quick, but not a furiously hot oven. These cakes make a delicious addition to the afternoon tea table.

T will be seen that when yeast was not em-I will be seen that when years was not em-ployed a thorough beating rendered bak-ing powder unnecessary. These receipts have been given verbatim that their verbose details may be compared with those in modern cook books, the other extreme of which often renders them obscure to the inexperienced house-

TO MAKE CURRY PUFFS

OIL one duck, with the liver and gizzard. Cut the meat of the duck into dice. Chop the gizzard rather fine. Rub the liver to a smooth paste with a little butter, and mix thoroughly with it three even tablemix thoroughly with it three even tablespoonfuls of curry powder. Place over the fire one quart of the liquor in which the fowl was cooked. Add the chopped meat, gizzard, one medium-sized onion, grated, one nutnees, grated, and salt to taste. When it comes to a holl add one tablespoonful of chopped parsley and the liver and curry mixture, thinned with a little of the hot liquor. Thicken with three tablespoonfuls of browned flour rubbed smooth with three tablespoonfuls of butter.
This will be sufficient filling for a dozen and This will be sufficient filling for a dozen and a half puffs.

For the puffs, bake cream-puff batter in the usual way. While still hot, split near the top and fill with the curry. Serve hot. Or, if you do not wish to bake the puffs almost any baker will let you have them without the usual sweet filling. They must in this case be placed in the oven for a moment to heat, before adding the filling. Watch carefully that they do not become too brown.

THE DELICIOUS MARYLAND BISCUIT

UNT Hannah's pride was her old-fashioned beaten or kneaded biscuit, and this is her receipt: One quart of the best flour, half a teaspoonful of salk, four onnees of lard chopped fine and rubbed thoroughly into the flour. Mix with cold water just as stiff as possible, so stiff that you feel almost hopeless of ever doing anything with it. Put it on a board and knead until it is perfectly pliable and makes a popping sound under your bands from the air hubbles breaking in it, and until you can pull it down in long thin strips. These tests are infallible, but you have to knead hard and long before the dough will answer to them. When it does you can make the biscuit. Break off places about the size of an egg. Mould them into round balls, and roll three-quarters of an inch thick with a rolling pin. Stick through and through five or six times with a fock. The oven must be well heated but not too bot, or they will be underdone in the middle and all of their excellence ruined. They will cook in twenty minutes if the oven is properly heated. A quart of flour makes twenty-four biscuits of ordinary size.

Do not restrain your boys in their instinctive desire for out-door

To achieve the full measure of strength, health and stature, boys should be encouraged early in life to frequent bathing, especially after perspiring and cooling, so that the skin-pores may be promptly opened and healthful reaction take place. The active boy who forms an affection for Ivory Soap will be the stronger for it, and "The stronger always succeeds."

APPY would be the woman who could say that the house-hold linen never became stained and the woolen garments and carpets never were socied with grease or other substances; but as women are not so fortunate as to be able to do that, it has seemed worth while this month to turn my attention to the general subject of cleaning various kinds of fabrics, as impuries relating to this line of domestic work constantly come to me. constantly come to me.

A GOOD CLEANING FLUID

When the male are dissolved; then take from the fire and add to quarts of white castile some of both castile some substance. The content of the purpose, but at times something more is required. A cleaning fluid that I have used upon silk and wooken fibrics with satisfactory results is made as follows: Put into a large saucepan two quarts of water, half an onnee of borax and four onnees of white castile soap, shared fine, and stir frequently until the soap and borax are dissolved; then take from the fire and add two quarts of cold water. When the mixture is cold, add one onnee of glycerine and one of either. Bottle and put away for use; it will keep for years.

To clean an article, first brush theroughly, and then spread on a table. Sponge with the cleaning fluid and rub hard until the stains disappear. Spots can be removed from carpets in this manuse.

disappear. Spots can be removed from carpets

COFFEE, TEA AND WINE STAINS

MANY inquiries come as to how these M. ANY inquiries come us to how these stains can be removed from table linen. If treated at once they seldom give much trouble. Pisce the stained part over a large bowl and poor boiling water upon it until the stain disappears. If, however, the stains be of long standing and have been washed with soap, it will be difficult to get rid of them. Javelle water (which can be made at home or bought of a druegist) will do it. Put about half a pint of Javelle water and a quart of clear water into an earthen bowl; let the stained article soak in this for several hours; then riuse thoroughly in three waters. It is only white goods that can be treated in this manner, as the Javelle water braches out the color. Another way to do is to put a little of the Javelle water in a sancer or small howl and soak the spot in this until it disappears. Riuse thoroughly,

TO MAKE JAVELLE WATER

TO MAKE JAVELLE WATER

INTO a large successor, porcelain-lined it presible put four pounds of bicarbonnte of soda and four quarts of hot water. Stir frequently with a wo den stick until the soda is dissolved; then add one pound of chloride of itne, and stir occasionally until nearly all the solids are dissolved. Let the liquid cood in the kettle; then strain the clear part through a piece of cheese cloth into widemouthed bottles. Put in the stoppers and set away for use. The part that is not char can be put into separate bottles and used for cleaning white floors and tables, also for cleaning the white floors and tables, also for cleaning the sink. In making this preparation be careful not to spatter it on your clothing or on the paint. Hulf a joint of this water can be put into a tub with about a dozen pails of warm sads and the soiled white clothes be soaked in Much of the dirt can be removed by this thod. The French laundresses use this preparation for white clothes.

CAUTION IN REGARD TO NAPHTHA

NAPHTHA and benzine are so effective in removing grease and dirt from most fab-rics, and are so clean, sure, and easily applied in eradicating buffulo bugs and moths, that I use them myself in preference to anything clse. In recommending them, however, to my readers, I always caution them to have the windows opened and have no light or fire in the room when using the articles. I want to say still further that the bottle should be kept closely suched and only the still should be kept. closely corked, and where there is light and ventilation.

Sometimes insurance companies have contested the payment of claims for damages by fire when it has been shown that there was naphtha or beazine on the premises, so it is well not to buy the fluids until the day you intend to use them, and to get only the quantity you will need for that one time. It seems to me that these agents are a great blessing; but the housekeeper should use them become and not leave the work to an irre-possible person.

CLEANING CHENILLE PORTIERES

WHEN one lives near a cleaning estab-lishment it is wise to send one's che-nille portières there to be cleaned, rather than to attempt to do the work at home; but as some of the several correspondents who have asked advice on the subject may not be in a position to take advantage of such facilities I will state that the first step toward an effective will state that the first step toward an effective cleaning is to shake the curtains thoroughly and brush out all dust. Next put two quarts of boiling water and two quarts of benzine in a tub or pail, and after submerging the portière in this, cover, and let it stand for ten or afficen minutes. At the end of that time sop it up and down, and finally hang it on the line in the shade, shaking it well to get out all the wrinkles. Each portière must be treated in this manner. If, when dry, they do not look perfectly clean, repeat the process. There look perfectly clean, repeat the process. There must be no fire in the room in which this work is done and the windows should be kept

Oil SPOTS ON CARPETS

CEVERAL subscribers ask how to remove coal-oil stains from a carpet. The stains will have disappeared ere this reaches the eyes of the inquirers. One of the properties of kerosene is that of evaporating and leaving no trace of its presence. As, however, this takes time, and few want to wait, such stains can be removed by rubbing briskly with benzine or naphtha or with the cleaning fluid. zine or naphtha or with the cleaning fluid mentioned in this number of the Journal.

CENTER PIECES FOR THE DINNER TABLE

A DESIRE for information in regard to center pieces for the dinner table, and especially whether tablecloths are used with them, is the subject of one of my correspondents' letters.

Two things are understood by the use of this A we things are understood by the use of this plimse. A "center piece" may be a vase of flowers, a handsone plant, a basket of growing ferns, a dainty piece of bric-A-brac, an ornamental dish of fruit, All these would properly come under that head. But there is still another kind, properly come under that head. But there is still another kind.

Almong rich people, when giving an elaborate dinner, a long scarf of rich satin, silk, plansh, lace or line embroddery is spread the length of the table. A kind of center piece more commonly used is a square of handsomely-embroidered silk or irnen placed in the center of the table. The flowers or fruit are set on this. Tablecloths are nearly always used. Where a hostess has a finely-polished table she sometimes uses only the center pieces on this when giving a luncheon or tea. It is, of course, to be understood that in using the long scarfs of silk or plash the table is very broad and the dinner is served from a side table. It is always hazardous for one of limited space and means to attempt to carry out the fads of extremely fashionable women. A handsome, well-laundried white tablecloth is always in good taste, and a dainty square of washable material in the center of the table a pleasing addition. a pleasing addition.

MATTENGS USED FOR WAINSCOTING

READER asks how China matting is for a wantscot for hall or st how it is put on, and how stained or finished;

bow it is put on, and how stained or finished; also, what quality of matting will do.

I think this material is not much used except by artists. The best quality of plain China matting costs at India boases from fifty to sixty cents per yard. It is very finely woren, and one can point on it with ease. Fancy mattings can be used, which, of course, does away with the necessity of painting.

There is another kind of matting which is used a great deal by artists, but this is to cover the entire wall. It is called both matting and canvas by dealers, and is really much like burdap. It is sewed together, stretched smoothly on the walls and then tacked on. This is the simplest method of decoration. The quality of the matting may be coarse or fine, quality of the matting may be coarse or fine, costing twenty-five costs or upward per yard. A matting that is sized, being stiff like back-ram, is sold to be posted on the walls like paper. This costs twenty-five cents and upward a yard. Some of the mattings are tastefully decorated. Typerastle embossed canvas is another sort of matting to be pasted on the walls; it is like embossed leather only in a few walls; it is like embossed lenther, only in softer and richer tints. It costs from one dollar and a half to ten dollars a square yard. It must be remembered that it requires an artistic eye and hand to use any of the mat-tings mentioned, and that the furnishing or the halls and rooms must be in hurmony with the walls clear be rooms may prove an eyesore, rather than a thing of beauty.

A MATTER OF INDIVIDUAL TASTE

TO arrange dishes in a glass china closet is so much a matter of individual tasse that it would be impossible for one not on the ground to answer the inquiries put to me by a woman who desires exact directions. The best I can do is to say that almost all these closets have grooves in the back part of the shelves and hooks on the under part, and if one has handsome plates or fancy dishes they should be set on edge in these grooves. This makes a handsome background. Hang pretty cups and small pitchets on the hooks, and group the remainder of the dishes in a convenient and tasteful manner.

RECEPTION HALL FURNITURE

SEVERAL requests have come for instruc-SEVERAL requests have come for instruction in the furnishing of a reception hall. Now, this matter depends wholly upon the style of the house. In stately city residences the reception hall would have a character entirely different from what it would in a large or small country louse. I assume that the halls my correspondents have in mind are in country houses. In that case the floor may be polished and a large rig laid in the center; or it may be covered with a carpet, in which case get Brussels, with small designs and neutral thats. If the room is to be used as a general sitting-room, have a table, some comfortable chairs, a soft and a book-ense. It is to be supposed that there is a fireplace, so there is also a maintel for a few ornaments. Some pictures on the walls, and, if the room be large enough and there be whidow room to spare, a few handsome plants are the most satisfactory kinds of contracts. spare, a few limitsome plants are the most sat-isfactory kinds of ornaments one can have. It must be remembered that the furniture of this room may be of as fine a quality as one pleases, but always should be plain.

USEFUL BUT NOT FASHIONABLE

TF table mats are no longer used at the dinner table," writes a woman to me, what has taken their place?" Where one finds the most elegance such mats

Where one finds the most elegance such mats are no longer used, and nothing is substituted. But housekeepers who must economize in laundry work still employ them. If used at all they should be white and washable. They can be made pretty and dainty when knit or crocheted with linen or cotton thread. They not only protect the table lath, but also save the table from the white marks which come from the placing of hot dishes upon only two thicknesses of cloth; therefore, for the family table the mat is not wholly objectionable. But when arranging the table for a ceremonious meal, use only a center place.

CARE AND FEEDING OF PARROTS

CARE AND FEEDING OF PARROTS

SOME of the questions asked in regard to the general care of parrots are: What kind of food to give them, when they should have a both, and how old they should he before they begin to talk?

Parrots, like children, sometimes begin to talk when nine months old; but it often hap peus that two or three years pass before they talk. The habits of these binds are a good deal like those of a domestic fowl. They like to scratch and roll in the earth. Some of them never hathe voluntarily; when they do, however, they usually spray themselves, rarely ever getting into the water. The best way to wash them is to shower them with water of the same temperature as that of the room.
Dry them near the fire, and be sure that they the same temperature as that of the recent. Dry them near the fire, and be sure that they do not get into a druft while wet. Have a box of earth in which they can occasionally scratch and roll. Ments and sweets are not good for these birds; fresh fruits, builed potatoes, hard-boiled eggs, brend and lettuce are all good, and, of course, everybody knows that Polly always likes a cracker.

TWO QUESTIONS READILY ANSWERED

Two QUESTIONS READILY ANSWERED

I't perplexes one woman who has written to me, to find a reason why milk sometimes will burn and at other those will not before it boils; also, why eggs sometimes will not thicken milk but will separate from it.

There are several reasons why milk burns. If the surface of the vessel in which it is cooked be rough, the milk will scored more readily than if the surface be smooth. If the vessel be placed on a lot fire that part of the milk which comes in contact with the greatest heat will burn before that in the upper part of the dish is even heated.

The sufest way is always to place the dish in which the milk is to be heated in another containing hos water. Double hollers of all sizes are for sule in kitchen furnishing stores; one or two of these will be found of the greatest value in the kitchen. If eggs and milk be enoked together too long, the egg will separate from the milk. Watchfulness is necessary when cooking any form of custard,

INQUIRIES FROM ONE SOURCE

SUBSCRIBER wants to know if it is A. necessary to take off all the scum from jellies and preserves, and if preserves should be put in jars when boiling and full of bubbles. The more thoroughly the skimming is done the clearer will be the preserve. Let the seum rest awhile in the bowl and then skins off the top. The clear syrup at the bottom of the bowl can be poured back into the kettle. Certainly, preserves should be put in the jars while boiling. The bubbles are caused by steam, not air.

The same correspondent asks what is best to iron shirt bosonis on, and how the bosonis are polished; how long flat irons ought to last, and what is the best way to take care of

Bosom-boards are sold at all kitchen-for-Bosom-boards are sold at all kitchen-fur-nishing stores; they are usually covered the same as a skirt-board. #### THE NEED OF SLEEP

HILDREN dislike to go to bed early, and when we put ourselves in their places and view the matter from their stand-point, we find that there is every is every reason why they should. In summer the long twilight is just begun. The dewy freshbegan. The down fresh-ness and coolness after the heat of the day makes active exercise delightful and games possible which could not be thought of at noon.

Who wants to be torn from these pleasures who wants to be torn from these pleasures and put between the sheets in a warm room with the windows single! In winter the evening is the cosiest time in the twenty-four hours. Tea, or dinner, is over, the lamps are bright, the fire shines, the others have put away the cares of to-day and those of to-morrow are still in the distance. The sittingmorrow are still in the distance. The sating-room seems much more desirable to the chil-dren than the quiet bedroom, where there is nothing to do but to go to sleep. Seen through their eyes "Early to bed" is a command more honored in the breach than in the observance.

THE mother who does not like to see her child's wishes crossed says; "Is it really necessary that they should go to bed so early, poor little things. I remember how I used to hate to go to bed. Why cannot they sit up a little while longer?" and yields.

No mother, certainly none of the mothers who gather in the "Mothers' Corner," would wilfully deprive her children of fool. She knows that they must have naterial, and plenty of it from which to develop hone and plenty of it, from which to develop bone and muscle, nerves and blood. She would shrink with horror from the thought of starving her children. If she cuts short their allowance of sleep she is doing them almost as great an in-jury, although the effects are not as immediately visible.

THE body is a delicate machine. All its parts are adjusted with the greatest nicety, and a decangement of one affects the whole. We cannot stop this complicated mechanism We cannot stop this complicated mechanism for repairs, because we do not know the secret that would set it going again. The retairs must be made while it is in motion. What hoppens in sleep? The nonchine goes slowly; the pressure is lowered, as it were. The heart beats less rapidly; the blood directaites less quickly; in a measure the nerves rest. They are no longer called upon to carry the thousand measures that occurs them so wisely by and messages that occupy them so wisely by day to and from the brain. The muscles are relaxed, there is no tension in any part; each is gaining vigor in the only way it can, by rest. Taking all this for by rest. Taking all this for granted—for no one denies it—lanv does it affect the question of children going to bed early?

YOUNG people require more sleep than adults, and they need it until they have attained their full growth. Their tissues, not being fully matured, cannot bear so great a strain as those of their elders. They must be longer in a state of relaxation and have more lines. songer in a state of realization and ince more time to recuperate. This can only be attained by more sleep, and to get this they must be in heal early. There is an old superstition that the sleep before midnight is more refreshing than that had nearer morning. This may have arisen from the fact that persons who go to hod at a reasonable time are not so ex-bausted as those who sit up until the small boors, and so feel more refreshed when they waken. When persons are over-tired sleep does not do them so much good, because a moderate amount does not give them time to CHILDREN, until they are twelve or thirhours sleep, eleven is better; until elgliteen or nimeters, nine hours is none too much. In this country our children inherit nervous tempermuents. No hygienic measure soothes, quiets and strengthens the nerves like plenty of sleep. Children should never be wakened in the morning. Yet the demands of house-hold convenience and the claims of school make it necessary that they should be out of hel at a certain hour, usually not later than seven. To make this possible, and give them their fair share of sleep so that they will be ready to waken of their own across, they must be in bed between eight and ten, according to their ages. If bedtime is made pleasant to them, as mother-love can make it, with a story, a little talk over the events of the day. with loving words and ministrations, the hardof handshment to bed will be realed or most of its latterness.

GAMES THAT ASSIST THE MEMORY

By Mns. A. G. Lewis

mothers only knew how to

would be solved quite successfully. Children, if they are bright and active, as all little people ought to be, must be about something. To play is the thing for them to do.

The Germans take front rank in the art of combining play and work. Their games amuse and instruct at the same time. Many of them are so simple in construction that the making of them forms one of the pleasantest features of the game. For instance: The ordinary picture puzzle, that is, a large pasteboard picture card cut into a dozen or more odd shapes for players to put together, not only into its original form as a card, but also to restore the picture to its original and perfect form, is used by the Germans in a similar fashion to amuse players: at the same time the child cannot help learning the multiplication table. The game is called "rechnent lotto" (reckoning lotto). It may be easily made, and by taking a sufficient number of cards the entire multiplication table is covered. It is unade thus:

Take a large sheet of pasteboard. From it

Take a large sheet of pasteboard. From it out twelve cards about the size of an ordinary sheet of paper. Paste upon these as many pletures with well-defined figures and of suffi-cient size to cover the entire card. Beight, cheerful pictures of animals, birds, children, dolls, etc., are best. Set the cards away to dry thoroughly, then draw twolve small circles about one inch in diameter upon the back or each card. Cut through exactly on the lines with a sharp knife, being very careful not to mutilate the edges of the card-board. Twelve lotto rounds are thus cut from each carst, and at as many places the outlines of the pictures

Upon the back of each of the lotto rounds mark the numbers to be multiplied, taking, for instance, the numbers belonging to the lotto of eights: 8 x 7, 8 x 5, 8 x 5, etc. On the back of the original eard from which the rounds have been cut, paste a piece of thick paper, white is best—then mork upon this paper in the twelve places from which the rounds have been cut the special numbers which are the been cut the special numbers which are the result of the numbers multiplied as indicated on the back of the rounds. Thus on the back of one round 8 x 7 is marked; in the circle where this round belongs 56 is marked. If the child is perfectly familiar with the multiplication table he will have no difficulty in placing the round in the proper place; otherwise he has still the belp of the picture. This is an admirable method of teaching, and is used in the kindergarten schools of Europe. The score is reckoned thus:

Game, 100 or more.
Each round, or lotto, correctly placed counts 5.

Each round incorrectly placed loses 5.
Each player who displaces a lotto incorrectly placed by an opponent and puts one in its place correctly, wins 10.
Where several are playing upon either side it is a part of the game to cover the mistakes of those upon one's own side by removing a misplaced lotto to put one correctly in its stead. This saves that side the loss of 10.
In reckoning the score, exercise in addition and subtraction is called for. Numbers other than 5 and 10, say 6, 7, 4 and their doubles, may be used in keeping the score.

In playing, if the children are beginners in the stady of numbers, one card at a time should be filled and the lottos for one lotto, eight fives for instance. When the players become quite proficient the whole number or cards may be spread out and the lottos for all curds may be spread out and the lottes for all tables mixed. In the latter case a larger num-ber of children may join in the game. In dealing out the lottes, they may be divided equally among the players, or in parcels to sait those engaged in the game.

Spelling lotto is also a delightful game, and especially suited to assist children in spelling correctly. Played with skill by older persons it takes equal rank with "Logomachy" and is similar in method. The lottos are made tike "reckoning lotto," only the pictures are not necessary and betters take the places of figures. The list of letters is as follows:

Eight each of the consonants b, c, d, f, b, l, m, n, r, s, l, w, and r, s, l, w, and r.

One each of j, k, v and x (these are called single prizee). One each of q and z (these are double fixes).

For younger players the lottes may be divided, giving to each an equal number, 'contest is to make the largest number words and spell the same correctly with the letters apportioned.

Words of two letters, like in, by, to, etc., count 1.

Works of three letters, like axe, but, joy, etc., count 2 for the word, also 10 each for the prize letters "x" in axe and "j" in joy. Words of Sur letters, like sack, save, etc.,

count 5 for the word and 10 for the prize letters "k" in sack and "v" in save. Words of five letters, like queer, blaze, etc., count 6 for the word and 20 each for the double prize letters "q" in queer and "z" in

"Quiz" is the most desirable word of all, since it contains the two double prizes.

Any word of more than seven letters counts the player 50. To use all the letters appor-tioned to a person counts 50 also.

It is considered a triamph to win the last-

Ruch misspelled word loses the side five. There should be a dictionary at hand, and the younger children should be helped to use it. this mone may be varied to make it more interesting to older players.

KEEPING OUR EARS OPEN

Do we have mothere take time to inten to our little ones, or are we always so busy looking after their temporal needs, which are so many, that we have no time to attend to their spiritual wants?

I know it is hard when we have so much to do to stop and think of a fitting answer to some of their searching questions and not be tempted to say! "Ram away, their mamma is too busy." I pleast guilty very other! still, when we look back do not we remember how but the would have felt at such a roply if we really asked an earnest question. Let us always be ready to belien to their little emploiments bachfully observed, and if they tell as of some wrong-doing through the day. Becaused the patiently and do not appear too strecked or the further confidence will be frozen up and we may have lot a poiden exportantly to being our callet.

Always impress on the child's mired that though you are scory for its wrong-doing, you are so given that its make it is befound out or, perhaps, add a story to his amoghthices of that its condendance will be seen so more into the you if he cames right to you all our well how ever my dear mother made.

that it makes it seem so more less to you if no comes-right to you and owns up.

I remember so well how easy my dear mother made: it for us to self her when we had been acceptive, in fact, anything that happened to its either of pleasure or pairs, and though she had note children, have and made found a ready, patient ear to listen to all they had to see.

That mother is now reaping her reward; not one of those boys and girls have a secret from her. Mothers! this is our safiguard for our boys; gain and keep their confidence, you will feel size they are about so have. If they tell you where they have been and what doing, and find you an interested listener, be not no creaty to find fault.

Order the mapkins to be special out to their fluit length after fronting. Do not have them folded. If they are put beside a list store or is the samethan the previses of along can be complained in a shetter time than if the room is cold. Use the same care in airing shorely for bath's erris. Do not fold them and run the risk of having the helde damp. If you do, colds or bould trouble are apt to be the result. If not anything so serious, there are some to be minor pains for which you can see no apparent cause.

It is well to undelt all bahy's clothes as they come up from the wash. Turn out the sicross of the shirts, him shockings strong side out, and make two expermity for the sake of health. A Department devoted to a sociable interchange of ideas among Journal readers. Address all letters to Mrs. Lyman Abbott, care of The Ladies' Home Journal, 433-435 Arch Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

an article in one of the recent reviews I was startled by the following sentence: "It would be satisfactory to think that if women are to become more like men they would at least try to be like gentlemen,

Do we want to be more like men? Are we losing not only the refinement of gentlewomen, but stoking below the courtesies of gentlewomen, but stoking below the pendence there certainly may be a loss of some womanly qualities, but do not let us forget that a true man may be a gentlemean, and that a woman who wears a "vest," a high collar, a "four-in-hand" scarf, a "blazer," and curries her long-handled parasol as near like a rane as possible, if she does not carry a cane itself, subjects herself to close scrutiny in regard to her manners. The modern maiden must learn to enjoy her extended liberty without going back toward barbarism. If she is to rosm abroad unattended, and find all the riches that there are be found in this good world of ours, she must do it with the manworld of ours, she must do it with the man-ners of civilized human beings, and not in the "rough-shod" ways of savages. If she is to justify her right to know everything, and to do everything in the world of aris and letters, she must carry herself graciously. If she is to earn her stipend, and with it buy her daily bread and her raiment, and pay for the roof to shelter her she must do it as a certificroman to shelter her she must do it as a gentlewoman and not as a would-be and boorish man.

W OMEN have been Billingsgate fishwomen, and plowed with a cow as a yoke fellow, and there was no talk about their "usurping the place of men." They were so like the Billingsgate man and the dookey that the world was not stirred to save them from being unsexed. If the "modern maiden," with an inheritance of refinement and education, and with possibilities far beyond those which the gentle malden of a hundred years ago, trained to stand straight by being strapped to "hack boards," and to converse sweetly by practicing "prime" and prime," and to make rose conserves and fine line, could by the wildest stretch of imagination conceive—if, I say, this young woman is going to become a swaggering fop, or a bluff boor, she is throwing away her birthright for a mess of garbage. Girls, I beg of you, mothers, I implore you, to keep sucred every gentle grace of womanhood. It is your right. Do not let a false social standard, or a discouraged heart, wrest it from you. If you have leisure, and live in a city, heware how you sink below the manners of a gentleman while you array yourself in the garb of one. The country girl is quite as much in danger. She may be "loud" in her fashlons and in her conduct, and I know of no place where there is more painful exhibition of unwomanliness on the part of young girls than on village streets. A girl who from babyhood is nurtured in the spirit of a noble graciousness, though she live in the bomblest cottage, will be a lady always. ... in the humble graciousness, though she live in the humblest cottage, will be a lady always. It was my good fortune recently to call upon the wife of a laboring man. So far as her manner or speech indicated, she might have been born into a noble family, and been sur-reconded always with layour. She received been born title a noble tamity, and been sur-rounded always with luxury. She received me with a dignified cordiality which I have rarely seen equaled. She made no apology for her dress, which was such as she wore about her work. She talked with intelligence. Because one must toil one need not lose the purity and the tenderness of heart which are

It is very certain be cannot expect his children to behave better than be does, and criticism learned of the father may be leveled at him in most un-

But women are quite as guilty as men of this breach of table manners when they are at hotels and boarding-houses, and alas, too many live in that way. And children are more likely to hear the neighbor's food criticized by mother than by father. It would be an immense gain in our life if we were all more simple in our eating. It would be pos-sible to bring up chibiren to est what is set before them, asking no questions and finding no fault. To secure this the food must be wholesome, abundant, neatly prepared and at-tractively served, and it must be the liabit of the parents to take the food without criticism and to make the meal hour one of pleasant conversation.

I AM a young housekeeper of four months' experience.

When I become a happy wife I knew very little about making a bappy house, and I wasted lots of those acquiring never the mean of the next matel. Now I make out a bill of fare for the whole week at one time. Sometimes I have to change it slightly, tot it is stach a relief to know what you have to cook beforedand. My other time saver regards the things we do not use every day. When we need an article a grand limit enses through trunks, better and densees. To avoid this I have a node book and put down in 8 the contents of each box, drawer and crunk. It is much easier to look over a list than the contents of a trunk. I tried this plan in morelog with great soevers. I know what is is a leave school for the other kind of school—housekeeping. I have the most police in all the kindest hadrand who helps me in so many ways.

In your attempts to make your work systematic, be careful not to lose the benefit of variety and surprise in your meals. It gets to be wearisome to think of certain dishes recurring with regularity week after week, un-less they are great favorites, and even then they are enjoyed more when they are in a measure unexpected.

A YERBOLD WIFE,

on are thinking too much about yourself, and that is one reason for your depression. Perhaps, too, you are out of order physically. Perhaps, too, you are out or order physically. You may need a doctor's prescription. Not long ago a man usually strong and vigorous, began to lose his appetite and his interest in life. He looked wrotched and felt so for weeks. Finally he was persuaded to follow a doctor's advice and in three days life had changed its hue and he began to look happier and soon "Richard was himself again." Never using whether you are hance or not occurs. mind whether you are happy or not, occupy yourself so constantly with making other people happy that you will have no time for "reflection;" then if you are not better, call upon a dector.

Ts it wise for people who have rhildren to keep their I. summer hopes fall of visitors? It summer not the time when children need special care and is not the constant presence of strangers injurical to discipline? ONE OF THE VISITORS.

It is dangerous for me to attempt to answer It is dangerous for the to alternat to answer this question with only a page of room for my answer. It suggests the whole topic of the treatment of children, and the very delicate subject of the purposes of marriage. We like to call our homes "nests." But are they? Are they in any sense prepared for "brooding and producing," which is what the purpose of the nest is defined to be. On the contrary, are not our homes built with every convenience except for children? The nursery may be wisely selected by exceptionally thoughtful parents from the general rooms, but what plans for the needs of infancy and childhood. plans for the needs of infancy and childhood. Parlors, library, dining-room, guest-room, or-dinary bedrooms, bath-room, kitchen, pan-tries, and—tucked away in the least comfort-tries, and—tocked away in the least comfortable spot—servants' rooms. These are all set down on the plans, but the most important thing is entirely left out. No wonder children feel themselves to be interlopers.

Now if the house were planned for it, and the porse allowed suitable guardians, there might be summer visitors without injury to the children. If the purse will not allow of both guests and children, the children have the first right. If the children have no proper place of seclusion, and their regular habits must be disturbed by the presence of guests, visitors should be mirely entertained. Hospitality belongs first to the angel visitors, who too often make but a brief stay with us.

CHOULD, or should not, the laws of "mine and thine" prevait in the family? Should each member of the family have his, or her, own belongings, or should the tense of propercoordin be discouraged allospether? Will one course breet selfishers, the other curelessness? This is a question which has been subject for discussion in our family for years.

Mass. W.,

I know of twins who never owned anything individually until they were twenty-one years old. The clothing taken off at night might not be worn by the same one next day. Jack-knives—that most precious possession of a boy —pecket-books, these were common property. Elderly men now, each owning large property, they are as near one in heart as it is possible.

In another household I knew of, a number of daughters had a common stock of under-clething. It was all kept in one place and each drew from it according to necessity. This, I should think, was carrying communism quite far enough.

Unless there is ownership I do not see how there can be any real exercise of generosity. Selfishness would be better subdued by training children to share their own with others than by preventing them from having any-thing to share. A free and hearty giving of one's own for the happiness of the hausehold makes the richest family life. Property may be the means of binding together, though its misuse is disrupting. Certain things may be, and should be, purchased by the head of the family for general use, and these things should be treated with core, because it is wrong to waste and uselessly to destroy. So there should be no room for carelessness whether things are owned in common or individually.

has been fed on lactated food by the advice of Dr. W. M. L. Fiske, of Brooklyn, and he sleeps well nights, crows and laughs all day, and is the happiest, rosiest, sturdiest little fellow that ever filled parents' hearts with delight. The food is all that is claimed for it. The starch and came sugar of other foods would make fit, but it is the solid bone and flesh, and rosy, rugged health, from using lactated food, at which we rejoice.

Lactated food is the one artificial food that develops a child's bones and muscles and which is easily digestible, as Rev. Mr. Hutchinson's letter and the picture of Donald prove.

Infants who are fretful, peevish and ron down by the hot weather, at once begin to gain when fed with this food. 'They eat it with evident relish and grow strong and well.

HE frosts which usu-ally come with the latter part of September will have killed the tops of gladioluses, dah-lias, and plants of similar character, and early in the present month their roots should receive attention. Select some warm and sunshiny day for lifting them. Be sure to apply the spade far enough away from the plant to loosen the earth without cutting through the roots, and lift them without breaking, if possible. Do not attempt to remove all the earth that adheres as soon as lifted, but place them where the sun can fall on these falls. lifted, but place them where the sun can fall on them fully and leave them there for two or three days, covering at night with something that will keep them dry. After having been left exposed to the sun for a time, the earth will become so dry that it will fall off readily when the roots are moved. After being cleared of the soil, leave the roots exposed to the sun awhile, as this causes evaporation of some of the juices of the plant, which might lead to decay if they were at once removed to the cellar. A professional florist will tell you that decay if they were at once removed to the cellar. A professional florist will tell you that more plants of this kind are lost in winter from storing while "green," than from any other cause. What he means by the term "green" is a too succulent condition. Ex-posure to the sun and air removes this objec-tionable feature. tionable feature.

MORE OCTOBER WORK

CUT off the tops a day or two after lifting the plants and several days before stor-ing the roots away, so that all moisture can dry out of the remaining portion of stalk. If this is not done, decay often sets in and works down the old stalk till it renches the point of its union with the bulb or tuber, and unfor-tunately it does not stop there. If the tops of dahlias and gladioluses are cut off within four or five inches of the root word the are four or five inches of the roots, and they are left exposed to the effects of the sun and drying winds for several days, the moisture will be entirely dried out of the stalks, and all danger of decay from this source be removed.

STORING BULBS AND ROOTS

THE best place to store such roots in is a room or cellar that is dry and cool, but frost proof. A damp place will be pretty sure to induce mould, and though this may not prevent the roots from coming through the win-ter in a living condition, it will so injure them ter in a living condition, it will so injure them that they will be pretty sure to give an inferior crop of flowers. I have found that dablins do well when kept in any place that keeps potatoes well; in too dry a place the tubers become shriveled and hard. This should be avoided, While they will shrink considerably under almost all conditions, they ought to retain a certain appearance of plumpness which is indicative of keeping well.

Gladioluses I would wrap in paper and hang in some cool, dry closet where they will be sure not to freeze.

CUTTING AND PRUNING GOOD deal can be done now that many A GOOD deal can be done now that many leave until spring. As soon as leaves fall, such shrubs as have not been pruned during the growing season can be put into satisfactory shape. In doing this be careful to discriminate as to the character of the shrub. Some kinds bloom early in the spring from buds which are formed this season. The blook is an illustration. son. The lilac is an illustration. If you were to trim it in fall you would be destroying its spring crop of flowers. But the rose makes a growth of branch in spring from which its flowers are produced. Such plants it is safe to trim in fall. Many plants in the bor-der will require attention. Some need division of the roots, and the formation of new plants from the healthiest portion of the younger growth. Others have become so matted from years of growth that it will be found advisable to remove a portion of them if no new plants are cared for. All should be dug about and manured. Old flowering stalks should be cut off, and all rubbish removed and buried or horned. By attention of this kind neatness can be made to prevail at all times of the year. and this in a measure makes up for lack flowers in the garden. Gather up the sticks and trellises which have been used as supports or plants, and store them away for future Bake up dead leaves from the lawn and put them away in some corner where they will rot and furnish material for potting plants in a coming season.

THE PLANTING OF BULBS

No garden should be without bulbs. Few N flowers are more easily grown, none more showy, and none disputes the senson with them. By a judicious selection of kinds. the border can be made bright from the going off of the snow until the coming of the annuals and bedding plants. October is the best mouth in which to plant them. If planted any time during this mouth they are enabled to form roots and become thoroughly established before really cold weather sets in and lished before really cold weather sets in, and next spring finds them in readiness for work. If planted later they do not have as good a chance to prepare for spring. Still, they will do comparatively well if not planted until quite late in November, as the roots will develon considerable under a soil whose surface quite late in November, as the roots will de-velop considerably under a soil whose surface is frozen over. But early planting is far pref-erable. Not only is it for the benefit of the plant as regards spring flowering, but it is much more agreeable for the gardener, as work out of doors on pleasant autumn days is conducive to health and enjoyment. If done late in the season, this work will be pretty sure to be poorly done, as conditions are against the satisfactory performance of it. Order your bulbs as soon as possible after re-ceiving the catalogues sent out by the many dealers, have your beds ready for them, and plant as soon as possible after receiving them.

THE LOCATION FOR BULBS

ET the location chosen be a well-drained Let the location chosen be a wen-unance, one, if possible. If not so naturally, make it so. Do this by removing the soil to the depth of a foot, or a foot and a half, and filling in the bottom of the bed with old rubbish, which will keep the soil which you re-turn to the bed from settling down into as compact a mass as before its removal. Let this drainage material be at least six inches this Grainage material be at least six inches deep, and, if possible, of something that will not decay. When you throw back the soil mix with it a liberal quantity of old manure, the older the better; stir the soil over and over till it is light and mellow. Plant such bulbs as hyacinths and tulips about four inches un-der the soil. Smaller bulbs need not be set quite so deeply. Put them about five inches apart.

I would advise planting each kind by itself.
The effect is much better than where several kinds are mixed in the beds. The colors can be kept separate, if desired. As a general thing, I would avoid all formal arrangements, thing. I would avoid all formal arrangements, as stiff lines and regular rows detract greatly from the beauty of effect. Small bulbs, like snowdrop and crocus, are most effective if planted here and there in the grass, or scattered about in the border. Much of the pleasure we get from them comes from the sort of "wild" effect which characterizes the wake robin and hepatica, and it is difficult to imagine either of those plants set, out in help or rows. either of those plants set out in beds or rows without quite spoiling their beauty, which is without quite spoiling their benuty, which is in direct conflict with anything like formality. Tulips come in several distinct classes. Some are early, others late. Care should be taken in planting not to get these mixed in the beds. Parrot tulips are extremely showy, and are most effective when planted by themselves. Hyacinths come into bloom pretty nearly at one time, so it will not be necessary to disone time, so it will not be necessary to dis-criminate among late and early sorts. Pretty effects are produced by planting masses of contrasting colors near each other. One of the finest of spring flowering bulbs is the daffodil, or garden narcissus. These flowers are of the richest yellow-some are white and yellow—and, to my mind, they are really much more beautiful than either the hyacinth or the tulip. If I could have but one bulb for spring flowering it should be this. They are very fragrant and fine for cutting. Plant in clumps. Scilla campoundata is a desirable bulb, having blue, white and pink flowers. Siberica has flowers of a lovely ultramarine blue, and is fine for edging. Snowdrops should be planted in clumps. So should the spring snowflake (leucojum vernum), which is a little later thun the snowdrop, which it somewhat resembles in form and habit. Sternbergia luten is a full-binoming buib. It will bloom in a very short time after being planted. Its flowers are yellow and of great beauty,

CARE OF THE BULES

TOVER your beds of bulbs with leaves or course manure to the depth of six or eight inches as soon as whater weather seems to be at hand. While all the kinds named in this article are hardy, therefore able to stand the winter without protection, they come through in so much better condition where some protection is given that it is righly worth while to be to the trouble of providing it.

Those who have never grown bulbs do not know what they lose by going without them. Coming so early in the season, they are more highly appreciated than later flowers; the care they require is slight, and the expense of obtaining them is small.

8. S. S.—Canna roots should be kept in a somewhat warm place during winter. If it is moist, they will be pretty sure to start into growth, but this does not injure them. Be sure to keep them away from frest, which is death to them.

Mas. T.—I think you will find sweet allyssum what you want. It can be grown from seed. It is a profise bloomer, and very fragmant. It is well adapted to lang-ing basics. Ity starting plants in November, you can have it in bloom all winter. Try it.

ANATECH FLOREST-Lilies can be increased from seeds or from scales. There is also a natural increase of bulks about old plants cuch year. You would find it slow and difficult work to grow these plants from scales, and the seeds of many varieties do not germinate readily.

R.—Most greenhouses, expecially those owned by amateurs, are kept at too high a temperature. A suit-able night temperature for mixed collections is about 50°, where hot house plants are grown, 50° to 60° may be better. During the day time 70° will be sufficient for nearly all kinds of plants.

BOOKNEH-My experience with double perturbation winter has not been a satisfactory one. It blooms need with one during the semanter, but after it is becought into the house its flowers almost aimogs fall to develop. I have not been able to discover why out of doors it is over as free a bloomer or as sturdy a grower as the single kinds.

6.—I am constantly in receipt of similar complaints. Persons write me that their daffodis tool and that; year after year it is the same. I cannot tell the reason, I have advised replanting, division, etc., but those who have tried those things write me that there is no improvement; the plants grow well, but they will not mature flowers. Can any one tell what the reason is?

F. S.—One of the most satisfactory late blooming border plants is the anemone japonica. It is very hardy. Its flowers are white and a pale red. I know of only these two varieties. Let it form large clomps, which it will soon do if given a rich soil, and you will be pleased with it, I am sure, as its flowers are very beautiful, and seem doubly so because they come at a senson when there is almost nothing else in blooms.

E. H. N.—If gerantums are healthy, and the cellar is dry, there should be no difficulty about wintering them. They should be given but very little water, and kept as usually dormant as possible by keeping them coal and in the dark. Many of the readers of this paper have doubtless tried wintering them by lunging up the roots. Will some of them who have been successful with this method please tell as how they cared for their plants?

Max, Gray—The pittosporum plant is hardy at the south, but with us at the north it must have greenhouse protection. It has a thick, isothery lenf, with a shining surface. Its flowers are a pale yellow, not at all showy, lost very fragrant, Old plants attain the size and dignity of a shruh, and are greatly prized by those who own them. You can get plants from most dealers. Grow them in loam mixed with some sand, and be careful not to overwater.

P. M. D.—Yes: there is a yellow Jasmine. You can obtain it by ordering jasmine revolitim. Its dowers are of the same size and shape of J. grandifforum, but are produced in larger clusters. They have the fragmines peculiar to the family to which they belong. This variety has thicker leaves than J. grandifforum, and is of half climbing babit. It should be given a soil of foam and sand, made rich with old manure. Give it a sunny place in the window.

Max. 62. H. 8.—I do not believe that these or any other plants will "mix" in beds from the rost. If you grow several varieties together, and save seed from them, very likely you will full to get flowers like those growing on the plant from which the seed was produced. One variety may be krillized by another, and the result will be flowers quite unlike either parent. In this way flocists obtain sew varieties. But I full to see how there can be any non-minon which will cause plants to vary from the original form. Will some scientific observer of the habits of plants tell us if this, is possible?

GEO. HUNTER—Perhaps the best variety of adiantum for the bouse is correction. This has very graceful fronds of a dark green, and they are freely produced. A more dedicate variety is a gracifilition. This sort is so delicate that its sprays look like a mist of green. It is an extremely beautiful kind, but hardly as well satisful to room-calture as the first named variety. In growing these plants, care should be taken to keep the air as most as possible about them, and they should be kept out of the sun. Give them a soil made up almost wholly of ind-mod ; a little sharp sand can be added with buestit, if the leaf-soil is deticant in fibrous matter.

Mas. A. A. C.—The tropalium throats is a taberousrooted nasturtings, which gives its fallest crop of flowers in winter. It is very desirable for pot enture. Put the builts and treat as directed for all other builts which you expect to get flowers from in winter time. They start your slowly, and you may think they are not going to grow, but they seldom fall to do so after a time; therefore have patience with them. They send up very eleuder stailse, which it will be necessary to support on trellises. After a while these stalks become current with pretty follage, and by said by hundreds of small flowers of scarlet tipped with black and yellow are produced.

I. O. O.—If the selection of hyacinths for winter binoming were left with me, i should choose the romans; that is, if I could have but one class. My reasons for preferring them are: First, they are surer to bloom red; second, they send up several stacks from the same bulb, therefore you get more flowers; third, they are more graceful, as the flowers are bone loosely on the stalks, and the crowded appearance pseudiar to the collinary hyacinth is avoided; fourth, they are better adapted for cutting. You can get them in pure white, soft rose, light blue and a pale yellow. None of them have the rich colors of the other class, but their delicate coloring is very fine.

JOSTE M.—You will find the lantains a good bloomer all the year round. In fact, it may well be called a constant bloomer. If prevented from forming seed it will be always in bloom if given anything like the care it ought to get. In this respect it excels the greanium. The white kinds are most desirable, but the yellow and orange varieties are extensively grown, and every collection should have one or more of them. Of the very collection should have one or more of them. Of the very collection of light and out off the old flowers as seen as used they prime, and you will have no trouble its having flowers from your plants overy day is the year. It is well to out back the old branches from times so time, to induce new growth, as the quantity of flowers depends largely on this.

Several. Incriners—I have frequently spoken of the desirability of the ramin for winter use in the green-house, and each year's trial convinces me more and more of its value. I keep several plants growing in not all theyear round. I find that they care very little for a season of rest. In againg I re-not them, removing as insuch of the older portion of the root as possible. In full I dig entax-much of the oldesel as can be removed without disturbing the roots, and fill in with a rich compost. The plants grow all the time. As seen as a stalk has preduced flowers cut but, indeed it desired to travell for its follage. New stalks are pushing at all times. The new Person's north are constant bloomers, not their flowers rival those of the occlud, amany illusted ghalloius in form and color.

Miss Canyt. B.—Of course, as run say, a got looks letter when painted, but the question to be considered in its it any better than, or as good as, a powers got for grow plants in. In the lying-room, where the air is very dry and unran, I think justiced pelesare satisfactory because they have a tendercy for keep the over-leaded air from questing empowalent through the strike of the got, but in the greenforce I would south prefer the angained got. #### USEFUL THINGS WORTH KNOWING

OFTEN it is the stray short hint or sugges-tion that we read somewhere which proves a mountain of help at some critical time, and the subjoined little helps have been gathered and put together in the hope that they may be of practical use to some one of the JOURNAL readers.

CARE OF THE SICK

KEP the patient in a quiet, sunny room, KEP the patient in a quiet, supply room, with an open fireplace, if possible. Remove all heavy curtains, table covers, hangings and unnecessary furniture. Keep the temperature just below 70°. Have as far as possible no visible evidences of medicine about the room. Keep the patient scrupulously clean and neat, and encourage her to habits of cleanliness. Allow no perfume to be used. While waiting upon the sick wear a gown that will wash, and felt slippers. Feed your patient often, and arrange the food attractively. Do not allow wilted flowers to remain in the room.

TO CURE A BUNION

BATHE the affected part in hot water to which a tenspoonful of salt, a table-spoonful of starch and a few drops of arnica have been added, wipe dry with a soft linen towel and apply lodine with a camel's hair brush. Wear a loose shoe out of doors, and while in the house a slose which has the beather covering the bunion entirely cut away. Bunions are caused by undue pressure. A good plan, if you have to be out a great deal, is to have the shoemaker cut a piece from your shoe where it presses upon the bunion, and replace it with an invisible patch.

CARE OF THE PIANO

To keep a piano case in good order great care must be taken in the application of so-called "piano polish" which is constantly being offered for the purpose of making the instrument look bright. A very little polish should be used, and that must be rubbed off well with a soft woolen cloth. The best way to clean a piano is to use lukewarm water, and a fine oil chamois. Go over the case a little at a time and rub dry with your chamois skin. Bruises may be removed by the appli-cation of a little pumice stone. Always use a silk duster for a piano.

CLEANING CURLED HAIR

TAKE your mattress into an empty room TAKE your mattress into an empty room and remove the hair from it slowly, so that you may not be choked with dust. Pick the hair over thoroughly and wash a little of it at a time, through several pails of strong soap-suds. When it is well riused and wrung as dry as possible, lay it in two thin sheets of thin muslin, basting them together at the ends and tacking them here and there in the center, and hang up to dry. Work of this kind should only be attempted when the wenther is likely to be fair.

SOME WEATHER WISDOM

RED skies at sunset indicate fine weather; a bright yellow sky in the early even-ing denotes wind; a red sky in the morning betokens bad weather. Small dark clouds foretell rain; generally the softer clouds look the less wind but more rain may be expected. Fog is an indication of fine weather; so is dew.

THE USES OF SALT

SALT sprinkled upon any substance that is burning will stop the smoke and blaze. Salt sprinkled upon coals that are blazing from the fat of broiling chops will cause the flame to subside. Salt used upon carpets when sweeping will brighten them and act as a preventive of moths.

TO CLEAN FEATHER PILLOWS

PEATHER pillows may be freshened and The feathers made light by placing them on a clean grass plot during a heavy rain storm. Let them be thoroughly wet, and then hung in a shady place to dry. Feather pillows should never be exposed to the sun.

FUMIGATING A SICK ROOM

SPRINKLE a spoonful of ground coffee upon a fire shovel on which two or three live coals have been placed, and immediately the sick room will be filled with a pleasant odor, which cannot be anything but refresh-ing to the invalid.

OIL AND GREASE STAINS

STAINS of oil and grease may be entirely removed from carpet or cloth by the brisk application of buckweat flour, removing the flour as soon as it has absorbed the oil, or until the spots shall have completely disappeared.

FOR TIRED FEET

BATHE the feet in cold water, if possible; B if cold water is unpleasant use warm and plenty of plain unscented soap, dry thoroughly with a soft towel and then sponge off with equal parts of cold water and alcohol.

SALT FOR TABLE USE

SALT, for table use, should have mixed with it a small quantity of cornstarch before putting it into either salt cellar or salt shaker. This will prevent the tendency it has to form into solid lumps.

TO CLEAN STAINED WOODWORK

LITTLE cold ten mixed with warm water and applied with a soft woolen eloth will make stained woodwork look bright and fresh.

CELECT no Christmas gifts till you see the beautiful Premium Supplement to be issued with the November and December numbers of THE LADIES' HOME JOURNAL. It will tell how to secure handsome and desirable presents for young and old without the outlay of a cent— only a little work.

Our readers will be entitled to the benefit of the very low cash prices put on each article, and those who prefer to pay cash rather than to earn the goods as premiums, may secure what they desire at prices lower than those at which the goods are offered for sale by dealers.

Subscribers who live in the country will find in this Supplement the same varieties of goods sold in the large cities, at a lower price, and may make their selections with confidence, everything beinz entirely as represented. Thus the disappointment sometimes met with in dealing with catalogue houses of uncertain character may be avoided. We cheerfully, and at all times, adjust any matter of complaint.

Our Supplement offers in fancy work materials the highest grades at the lowest prices. Etching, Filo, Rope and Embroidery, fast color Silks in every shade, and a large and varied assortment of Stamped Linens. Books are one of the strong features of our Premium De-partment. They are given as premiums, or sold at very low 272 rates. We can furnish any book published—whether on our list or not.

All the standard works, family and teachers' Bibles, story-books for boys and girls, anything—everything may be ordered

Order as soon as the Supplement is re-ceived. Don't wait till the great December rush is bringing us ten thousand letters a day, all demanding immediate attention, when the express company's vans and the over-crowded mail bags make prompt deliveries impossible. Beautiful gifts in toilet goods, dinner and tea-sets, all kinds of mechanical toys, writing tablets, jewelry, silver-plated, and other household wares, in Let everything desirable for Christmas gifts may secured.

SAFELY GARNERED

BY LILIAN CLAXTON

"WAS she your only child?" asked I.
"My only one," the answer brief;
And yet he spoke without a sigh, Without a touch of grief. He said the words with quiet smile, I paused, and wondered for a while.

I marveled at that quiet tone, la which no shade of sorrow lay; And thought of darlings of my own, Of laughing faces gay. And yet not one amongst all there, Not one, I felt, that I could spare.

"You need not grieve for me," said he; Your little ones are not more blessed; This darling child, so dear to me, Has entered into rest. Amid the Joys that never fade, She dwells for aye, my little maid."

I saw him raise his eyes and hand Up to the quiet summer skies-Up to the sinless, better hind, To where his treasure lies. Where with untiring, little feet, She trends the City's wondrous street.

Your little ones," he still went on, May live to feel life's toil and care; But where my little child has gone, Thank God, no pain is there! No shade to dim the starry eyes, In the deep calm of Paradise.

"The coming years will changes bring: Your little ones will older grow; But she is still the little thing I lov'd so long ago. Forever, in the higher place, She'll bear the dear and changeless face."

Too true! Down here the years roll on, And hearts grow hardened and defiled. She beareth yet—his fittle one— The pure heart of a child. No deeds that he need wish undone: A very blameless little one.

I took the picture up again: Too fair, too fair, those childish eyes, To dim and sorrow with the pain That in this old world lies. Too free from sin-too free from tears, To shadow with the toil of years.

We strive and argue here below Of mysteries beyond our ken: But she, my little maid, doth know The things that puzzle men. To this young child they have been clear For many and for many a year."

O child whose feet have touched that strand Beyond the river's restless tide, Speak to us of the Fatherland, To light life's eventide! To guide us where thy feet have trod,

SUPERSTITIONS OF HALLOW-E'EN

BY ALICE C. WILLARD

ALLOW-E'EN is the evening preceding Hallow-day, or All Saints Day, which is estobrated November 1st, in honor of the conversion, in the seconds con-tury, of the Paulleon at Rome into a Christian place of worship. Pope

Bouilace IV dedicated this day to the Virgin

Bouilace IV dedicated this day to the Virgin and all the neartyrs.

Popular superstition has given the thirty-first day of October a peculiar character of its own, no other day of the year having so many and such strange customs attached to it. Witches, devils, fairles and disembodied spirits walk abroad on that night; charms and divinations attain their highest success with all and any who wish to try them. Although in some parts of the United States and Canada the Hallow-e'en customs are sometimes observed by young people, north Kagand Canada the Hallow-e'en customs are some-times observed by young people, north Eng-land and Scotland may be said to be the birth-place and home of Hallow-e'en festivities. The customs of this night are much alike where-ever they are practiced. Nuts and apples are always in great demand, and enormous quan-tities of them are consumed. In the north of England Hallow-e'en is sometimes called "nat-cruck night." Nuts are useful for another pur-pose than the one they are usually put to. The maiden who wishes to know which of her lovers is faithful puts two nuts on the burs of the grate, naming them after her lovers. If either nut crucks, or these off the grate into the fire, that lover will prove unfaithful; but if fire, that lover will prove unfaithful; but if either put blazes or burns, the lover is faith-either nut blazes or burns, the lover is faithful, loving and true.

Another way is to place two nuts on the grate, naming one for the lover, the other for herself. If they burn together quietly, all will go smoothly and well in the courtship and marriage; but if they start away from each other, the hoped-for happy ending of the courtship will never occur.

Apples are used in several ways on Hallow-e'en, the two most popular being, perhaps, the attempting to take a bite out of an apple suspended by a string from the ceiting without touching it with the hunds; and ducking for apples in a tub. This last feat is much more difficult to perform them it at first appears to be. The tub is full of water, the apples, with and without stems, floating temptingly pears to be. The tub is full of water, the applies, with and without stems, floating temptingly on the top. It does not look as if it would be at all hard to pick one up with the teeth. But at the first attempt to seize it the tantalizing apple ducks its head under water, only to show its blooming checks on the opposite side of the tub a moment later.

In Scotland the first ceremony of Hallow-e'en it the rulling the said of the vegets.

is the pulling, by each of the young people, of a stalk of kale. Each must pull the first stalk be comes to in the gorden. Its being big or little, short or tall, straight or crooked, will foretell the size, shape and beight of the fu-ture husband or wife. The amount of earth that clings to the root will indicate the for-tune or dowry.

Another superstition tells us that if one will take a candle, po alone in a dark room and cut an apple before the looking-glass, the face of the future husband or wife will peep over the shoulder, and we can plainly see the reflection of it in the clear. flection of it in the glass.

Still another superstition, which is quite common in Scotland and Ireland, and is mentoned by Burns in his Hallow-e'en poem, was told to me years are by a young Irish girl, who firmly believed in it. She said it was customary in the part of Ireland where she had lived for a girl to go alone at midnight and lived for a girt to go alone at matinglet on Hallow-e'en to the nearest kiln, taking with her a ball of blue yarn. Keeping hold of the end, she throws the ball over into the kiln-pot, then winds the yarn into a new ball. As she nears the end, some one will hold the yarn and prevent her from winding any more of it. She then asks, "Who holds?" and in answer a voice will give the Christian and surname of her fature the Christian and surname of her future bushand. I asked Katie, my informant, if her lover held the end when she tried wind-ing the yare, and she replied in an awe-struck tone that he did; but frankly admitted that it frightened her so that she dropped the ball and ran home without walting to ask, "Who Burns tells of a Hallow-e'en custom. Take three sancers; fill one with clean water, one with inky or foul water, and leave one empty. Blindfold a person and lead him to the dishes, where he dips his left hand into one of the where he did has been laint like one of the three. If by chance he touches the clean water he will marry a mush; the black water a widow; and the coupty dish signifies that he will live and die a bachelor.

Children born on Hallow-e'en are said to be able to see and converse with fairies, witches and other supernatural beings, which reminds me that I once went to a delightful imprompta and informal Hallow-e'en birthday party. The invitations were sent by telephone and mea-senger on the very morning of Hallow-e'en, and all arrangements and plans for the even-ing's enjoyment were made on short notice, The rooms were lighted by candles instead of gas; pumpkin jack-o'-lanterns stood in unexpected places about the halls and rooms. The mantels were stacked with brightly-polished apples, and fancy dishes of mus and raisins, grapes, oranges, figs, dates and home-made candles were set everywhere about the rooms, and every one was expected to help himself to mything be wanted at any time. Apples were suspended from the gas fixtures, the "luggies three" were there, and quarts of chestnuts with which to discover, at the hard coal fires with which to discover, at the hard coal fires in the grates, whether hovers were true or not. All the old customs which were practicable in modern parlors were tried. The festivities ended with a dance, and at half-past eleven we turned our faces homeward, to arrive in time to see, if possible, some of the strange sights which are supposed to appear on Hallow-e'en at "the very witching time of night."

cents a yard. The fringe and drawn work are colored a dull red, and it is much easier to do this before the threads are drawn.
Therefore, your best plan is to

Therefore, your best plan is to first draw a thrend eighteen inches from the end, which, when doubled and sewed up, gives you a beavy fringe of nine inches. Three inches from this draw another thread, leave space of two inches for drawn work and again draw a thread; then leave a space of twenty inches for the painted border, draw a thread and leave space of two inches for second band of drawn work. Repeat this for the valance that falls over the top.

Next proceed to paint the orchids in a bold, conventional manner in reds and yellows, making a background, as suggested, of pulsus done in grayish greens. The drawn work may be done last. For this use an ordinary twine, colored red.

The best effects are produced on burisp with dyes. Forty cents will buy all the colors you require. These colors should be substued by mixing.

by mixing.

Dissolve a very small quantity—as they are very powerful—of each in water, and bottle, pouring a few drops in a shallow dish and mixing as required when about to use them. If oil colors are used, they should be mixed with turpentine instead of oils, and put on very thin in all parts but high lights.

MUSICAL WHIST WITH LIVING CARDS

N these days when it is the fashion to understand and study whist, it is interesting to know that as a novelty for a bozar the game has been introduced as "Musical Whist with Living Cards." Four players are sented upon raised seats; a large, square cloth, on the floor or on a platform or stage, forms the card table. The cards are represented by the card table. The cards are represented by persons in appropriate continues, and the gowns for the court cards may be very original. The clubs usually wear gray and white, the coublems being in black velvet, and have crowns of silver-gray and jet. Hearts wear a pretty shade of green, with white, and the emblems are in red. Spades are in pink with black velvet emblems; diamonds in yellow with deep red. The parts of the smaller cards may be taken by children in gowns of creamwhite, and mobrans, the cards being indicated in large characters on the front of their dresses; or they may carry an immense card, two feet or they may carry an immense card, two feet in length, and hung over the shoulders, hunging in shield fashion in front, on which are the spots of the card, and a card shoul hang at the back also and display the ordinary kind of of a card back. The cards enter to the music of a march and are preceded by two little pages clad in slashed satin suits, capes with ostrich tigs, and carrying wands of silver. Shuffling, cutting and dealing are shown by a dance, and the cards then arrange themselves in front of their respective players. Each player indicates in turn the card to advance to the center, with musical accompaniment. The winning card of each trick leads the others to one corner of the square where they form in file, and so on, closing up when six tricks are made on either side. At the conclusion of the game the tricks the winning side lead off in triumph those of the losing side.

A NOVEL FLORAL BOOTH

NOVEL and original flower booth was A seen at a bazar recently. It was in the form of a gondola, painted white, instead of the solemn regulation black. The prow was glided. The part of the gondola which is always covered was leftopen, and a canopy surmounting upright poles made a graceful effect. White cheese cloth, gold tinsel fringe and gurlands of smilax made pretry decorations. The gondola was placed on supports to make it high enough for a table.

(2) Teach your little girls to help the servants and to put the flashing tencires to everything about the house; treats them to be useful the ornamental is easily learned.

8. H. C.—In ancient times gloves were not suffered in a church because the Real Presence in the form of becod and wine was supposed to be upon the alter. It is probably from a servical of this rule that Episco-pallans receive the consecrated bread in the Commun-tion service in their angioved hands.

Int.ra.—The "Brook Farm" experiment was a con-operative social, edocational and saricultural organiza-tion which was begun in 1841 under the lead of Groupe Ripley, a Unitarian elergyman, and his scife. It was discontinued to 1847, parity for financial reasons. "Brook Farm" was located about eight miles from Roston.

Correspondent—If you are wise you will pay no attention to advertisements encorring measy in the English Court of Chascery for American belos. Advertisers who claim that they can locate such money money which has no existence, in fact) are usually mapriscipled persons, whose interest causes as soon as they receive a fee.

Many Grats.—The subject of klesing cannot be discussed in this evaluation, and we must connect our girl renders against addressing any questions bearing upon this matter to us. Poerry is defined as "Something which cannot be said in prese," and kissing is something of the same sort; in any case we are determined to leave the "kiss" to the poets, and confine our answers to prose questions.

A THANKSGIVING THIEF

By Mary E. Wilkins

OPHIA HURD stood in her front door, and Mrs. Packer stood on the steps taking leave after a neighborly call. A stiff wind, with a chill of snow in it, blew straight in Sophia's face and ruffled her thin, light crimps. She took off her apron and put it over her head as a hint; but Mrs. no hurry to go; the wind was off her apron and put it over her head as a hint; but Mrs. Packer was in no hurry to go; the wind was at her back, and she did not feel it so much. "I heard the Hopkinses was goin' to have Emma's beau to-morrow," said she.

"Be they?" returned Sophia, indifferently. She looked down with a hard gaze at the old stringy black feather which adorned the top of Mrs. Packer's every-day bonnet.

Mrs. Packer stood so much lower that she had to wrinkle her forehead up to her straight line of gray hair when she looked at Sophia.

"Yes," said she, "they be. Mrs. Green said they'd got two chickens besides the turkey. She see Henry Hopkins carryin' of 'em home. I 'spose they're goin' to have chicken pie, too."

Sophia aroused to interest in spite of the icy wind in her face. "Terrible fine, ain't they?" said she, with a scornful lift of her nose. "Well, I guess they ain't got so much more to do with than other folks."

"I guess they ain't neither. I heard Sam Brightman's folks was pretty bad off. I guess they won't have much Thanksgivin."

Sophia jerked furiously when the wind strack her, and put her hand to her crimps, which blew back, and quite bared her high, flat forehead. "I dan know nothin about it," said she harshly. "I can't keep track of all the poor folks in town, an' I dan know as I'm called on to. There was rich and poor ever sence the world was made, an' I guess there always will be; there nin't no way to help it that I can see, except by shiftin' the money to the other side; like the weights in balances, that I can see, except by shiftin' the money to the other side; like the weights in balances, one side's got to be up an' tother down. I dun know why them that's up have any call to go down, if they can help it. Gen'rally speakin', folks have money because the Lord has given 'em faculty to git it, and keep it. If folks ain't born with faculty I don't see as it's anybody's look-out but the Lord's. Them Brightmans never had any faculty. Mrs. Brightmans never had any faculty. Mrs. Brightman, she can't cut out a calico dress to save her life, an' Ella she was just like her, an' got married to a man a good deal more so. It was lucky he died, I guess. There's them three white-livered children, an' they don't look as if they had enough faculty to make mud pies, an' teeter, an' as for Sam he ain't never had mone. I dun know but he does his more than a same had a same h never had none. I dun know but he does his work well enough when he can git it, an' he's willin', but he's slow as old Tilly, an' he sin't never had no business faculty. Some men would have got work whether or no. He come to me one day last week an' wanted to cut up my wood, but I told him no, pretty quick. There's old Mr. Thomas will cut it cheaper, besides working faster, I guess. I nin't goin' to have Sam Brightman if I know which side my bread's buttered on."

"Well, I dun know," suid Mrs. Packer. Her dull, placid face took on a reflective cast; she was thinking what next to say. Sophin pulled her apron closer, and scowled against the wind.

her apron closer, and scowled against the wind.

"You said you wern't goin' to have any company Thanksgivin'?" said Mrs. Packer, slowly.

"No, I ain't," returned Sophia, in a sharp, decisive tone. New topics were scarcely endurable, and recapitulations were maddening in the face of this north wind.

"Welt," said Mrs. Packer, "I'm going to have Cyrus an' the children, an' brother Exra's folks, as I said before. It makes considerable to do, but.—"

"I should most think you'd feel as to do, but—"

"I should most think you'd feel as if you'd got to be home seein' to things," interrupted Sophin, with a blue glare of her prominent eyes;
she was quite out of patience.

Mrs. Packer looked up at her with insocent incredulity; she could not believe that she had heard rightly."
What say?" she faltered.

"I say that I should most think, as long as it was the day before

"I say that I should most think, as long as it was the day before Thanksgivin', an' you'd got all that mess of company comin', that you'd have to go home an' see to things,"

"Fanny is to home," said Mrs. Packer, feebly. She had not yet fully taken in Sophia's meaning. Her own aggravating points were such purely negative ones that people seldom felt at liberty to retaliate, and when they did she scurcely knew what they meant. However, now a sudden red flashed over her large, dull face. large, dull face.

Good afternoon, Sophia," the said with a sudden accession of dignity, and went down the path to the gate with a clumsy sidewise jolt

Sophia shut the front door with a bang, and went into the warm sit-ting-room. She stood close to the air-tight stove, and spread her long, thin hands over it. "She's gone off mad, an' I don't care if she has," she said. "If folks don't know she said. "If folks don't know enough to go when they start to, it's time they was told. She always makes the heft of her call in the doorway. Standing there in that awful wind! I shouldn't wonder if I'd caught my death."

There was nobody else in the room, nor even in the house, but Southin shivered impressively with room, nor even in the house, but Sophia shivered impressively with appenling groans; and finally, when she passed the looking-glass on her way to the kitchen, cast a woe-begone look at herself. "I look dreadful pinched up an' blue," she muttered.

The kitchen was full of warm sayory and solery olders. A plum sayory and solery olders.

savory and spicy odors. A plum pudding and a chicken pie were baking; a row of new pies, and some cake stood cooling under the pantry window. On the kitchen table was a great turkey and another chicken rig all ready for the chicken pie, all rendy for the oven.

Sophia looked into the stove oven to see how the pudding and pie were progressing. The hot, fragrant steam rushed in her face. She turned the pie around.

The two kitchen windows faced southwest,

the pie around.

The two kitchen windows faced southwest, and the afternoon sunlight, shifting and fluctuating as if itself blown by the wind, came in. A great green parrot in a wire cage bung in one of the windows. He stood on his perch, and watched Sophia with one yellow eye.

Finally, when she arose, he called out in his dissonant voice—the greeting of a merry comrade: "Hullo, Sophi, how's your health? Want a cracker?"

Sophia went into the pantry and paid no attention. She had had the parrot for years; his conversational powers were limited to those three clauses of friendly salutation and inquiry, and one other—"Clear out."

Presently he shricked out that also, and then swung wildly back and forth by his strong benk.

Sophia cleared a space on the pantry shelf; then she carried the turkey in with a staggering rush. "I declare, I guess I've lamed my side this time," she grouned when she had set it down, "I hadn't ought to have lifted it, but I kind o' hated to leave it out on the kitchen table all night. It weighs a good fifteen pound; I wonder what Mrs. Packer would ha' said. She was dyin' to get out here. I guess she heard I bought a big one, an' mebbe old Mr. Thomas told how I got him to kill them two chickens. Well, it aln't nobody's business; if I aint got folks to come to Thanksgivin', I guess I can have as good a dinner as them that bas."

"Hallo, Sophi," screeched the parrot, which had been listening on calmly.

them that bas."

"Hullo, Sophi," screeched the parrot, which had been listening on calmly.

"As long as I nin't got a cat or a dog, it's lucky that I've got a parrot that can pick the bones, instead of a canary bird," said Sophia.

"It's goin' to be considerable for me to eat up all that great turkey, an' them two chicken nies."

pies."

She mixed up another cake. When the pudding and chicken pie were done, she filled up the oven again. It was eight o'clock that evening when her Thanksgiving cooking was all finished, the dishes washed, and the kitchen put in order. Then she went to bed. She was a lonely woman; her own kindred were all dead and gone years ago; she had no husband nor children, and nobody to come home to Thanksgiving. But nobody in the village had a better filled larder than she. She was one of those who find a certain joy indewas one of those who find a certain joy inde-pendent of all associations in possessions; no loneliness could keep her to-night from com-placent reflections upon those loaded pantry shelves. There was more than she needed, but she had it. And after all it was not merely a question of material need and supply, but of all the natural craving of a lonely and selfcentred soul; it would necessarily take much of this grosser food to satisfy that, but satisfy that it did to a certain extent, and always had. After Sophia's mother died, and left her solitary in the house and in the world, the beau-tiful black cashmere dress, which she bought and wore to church the Sunday after, and also the fine black straw bonnet, with its tuft of black satin roses, had brought her a certain solace. Sophia's mother had been niggardly even with herself. When Sophia held the purse she was not niggardly with herself; the prichlers said she was averageout. They even with herself. When Sophia held the purse she was not niggardly with herself; the neighbors said she was extravagant. They watched some rolls of tapestry curret, a new stove, a new lamp, a new chamber set and spring hed go into the house with wonder and doubtful approbation. "Well, I hope the money'll hold out," they said.

But Sophia was shrewd enough; she knew that the money would hold out, and there was no risk in her feathering her nest prettily, although there were no opening mouths in it, if she enjoyed it. And enjoy it she did. She rocked easily in her new stuffed chair, over her new carpet, and she slept comfortably on her new spring bed, with the curved head-board of the new bedstend overshadowing her. She thought honestly, in her inmost soul, that she was happier than many women she knew who had large families, and little money, and were worried and overworked. Sitting early in church on a Sunday, with her nice black skirt falling daintily over her knees, her cushmere shawl arranged in studied folds around her unbending shoulders, her thin light hair in two carefully crimped scallogs over her temples, and her bonnet strings tied in an unburried bow, she watched the women who had risen early, gotten breakfast for a large family, put the house in order, washed and dressed the children, and laid out he husband's clean clothes for him, toil anxiously up the nisle, and felt'a peace in which she realized no savor of regret. Sophia Hurd had never had a love affair in her whole life; when she was a girl the young men were all afraid of her.

at her heels, and youth giving its one fleeting charm to her clean, sharp blonde face, this very Sam Brightman, whom she and Mrs. Parker had discussed, had gone home with her once from the singing school, had kissed her at the gate, and she had viciously shapped his face in return. That one kiss of boyish admiration had been her last, and, it was strange, but she had never forgotten it. She thought of it when poor Sam Brightman, bent and haggard with his long toil in his fruitless vineyard of life, had stood by her woodpite asking leave to cut it and so carn a few cents asking leave to cut it and so earn a few cents for himself and his half-starved dependents. All the boyish spirit and prettiness had gone out of him, and he had been a brave, pretty boy. Sophia, elderly and enveloped in a hard and regretless maidenthood, had stood in the doorway holding a shawl well over her face that she might not eatch cold, trying to drive what has the might not eatch cold, trying to drive a sharp burgain, and yet had thought of that old childish kiss. She was conscious of no sentiment regarding it; it was simply as the one rhyme in the prose of her life, and kept singing itself in her ears, foolish as it was. That night before Thanksgiving, when she lay drowsily in her chamber, she thought of it again; and a vague and half-reluctant fancy came into her mind of what her life might have been had she not repulsed that first kiss.

"There'd been turkey 'nough to go 'round, and pics, anyhow," she said to herself. "I spose he'd have lifted the turkey in an' out of the oven, an he'd spilt the gravy, likely as not; men folks are dreadful unbandy. I guess he'd been pretty well off though, to what be is how." Sophia pre-sed her lips contemptu-ously in the dark, as she thought of Sam Brightman's gentle, passive wife. It was a dark night, the wind still blew, the sky was overcast, and the moon would not rise till

Sophia fell asleep and slept so soundly that when she awoke with a great start she thought she had not slept at all. But the moon was an hour high, the clouds had cleared before it, and it was so light that she could see every thing quite plainly.

She sat up in bed and listened; she had a confused idea that she had heard a window opened somewhere in the house. Presently there came a sharp clatter from below; it sounded as if somebody had let a dish fall. Sophia got out of bed slipped on her shoes and stockings, put on her dress skirt and a shawl, then she went out boldly to the head of the back stairs, which were nearly opposite her

She listened: there was certainly some one moving about below. She clutched the stair-post. "Who's there?" she called out in a post. "W buld voice.

There was no reply; the noise ceased, "Who's movio" 'round down stairs?" she called out again; and the silence continued. "There's somebody down there," said Soplais, and her voice sounded still firmer and boilder. "I heard you, and I'm going to find out who you are. You can't git out of that winder again, nor out no door without my bearin' o' you, and then I shall look out an' see who you are. It's bright moonlight; you'd ought to have thought of that, whoever you are, before you come thierin'. You've got yourself into a pretty scrape, I guess you'll find out. Now, I'm goin' to set right here an' hark; you can't stir without my hearin' o' you, and you needn't think you can."

Sophia sat down on the top stair and waited Sophia sat down on the top star and wasted and listened. There was no sound from below, Suddenly the parrot fluttered and screeched his whole vocabulary in an agitated medicy; "Hullo, Sophi! Clear out. Want a cracker? How's your health?" Sophia knew that the unknown person below had moved.

"You're movin'," she called out, when the purrot's clamor had infled a little. "I heard you; you needn't think you can cheat me," There was silence again. Sophia listened.

There was silence again. Sophia listened. She sat there until the clock struck two, and heard nothing more. She was trying to per-suade herself that she bad imagined the terrifying sounds, and might safely return to bed, when there came a sudden choking cough

She arose and leaned far over the stair-rail, She arrow and leaned for over the stair-rail,
"Sam Brightman," she called, "you're down there; you can't cheat me. I know you're cough. Now you jest tell me what you're prowlin' 'round' my house in the middle of the night for. I should call it pretty work."
There was no answer. "Sam Brightman," she said again, and her tone was quite fierce;
"you speak this minute. What are you doln' down there? You con't cheet my. I've hear!

You can't clieat me; I've heard down there? you cough in meetin' for ten years. It's you, Sam Brightman, you that's a church-member, with a wife that's a church-member, prowlin' round women's houses in the middle of the night. I 'spose you think mebbe you've got a faculty for seculin' if you ain't got none for work. What you after down there? You speak, or I shall get dressed and come down." There was silence still.

"You Sam Brightman," said Sophia, "jest

as sure as you don't speak, and tell me what you're after, I'll have the sheriff come in the mornin' an' take you to the lock-up. Now, what are you after?"

There was another cough, and it sounded unexpectedly from just below her. "I'm after something to est for my wife and daughter, and grandchildren," answered a man's voice with a gruff defiance in it.

"Somethin" to eat? I should think you'd took a pretty way to get it. Ain't you aslamed o' you'self. Why don't you go to work?"

"Mebbe you can tell," replied the voice from below,

"Well," said Sophia, and her tone was a little subduet. "If you're so had off as all rhat, why didn't you come an' ask for victuals." Because I'd ruther stenl than beg; when I've worked jest as hard as I knew how all toy life, it makes me f-el more like a man," replied Sam Brightman flercely. "I ain't no call to beg. If I can't have my share, an't bem that belong to me can't have their share of the things in this world by any fair means, if folks won't let us. I mean to have 'em-

I made up my mind I'd steni a little Thanksgivin', seein' as the Lord hadn't give me none. Now you can do jest what you've a mind to with me. Get me sent to juli; it won't make no difference to em. I to jail; it won't make no difference to em. a sin't doin' anything for 'em, an' I'll get fed. They take some pains to keep thieves alive after they've caught 'em. Mebbe I'd better set 'em all to stealin'. Government has some look-out for wicked folks if it don't for good ones. You can do jest what you've a mind to, I'm rest earin'." I'm past carin'."

You can have one of 'em chicken pies, if you are in such dreadful straits as all that comes to," said Sophia in a sureastic voice. "I should think you talked real pretty for a church-member, Sam Brightman. Take one of 'em pies, an' go home, an' mind you shut the pantry door."
"I don't want your pie," said Sam Bright-man, and he conshed and

"Well, you can go without it then, if you don't want it after all this rumpus," returned Sophia. "There's one thing I want to know— What was it you tipped over and broke in the

"A dish, what kind of a dish?"

I dunno.

"I dunno."

If your folks are starcin' the way you say they are, I guess you'll be glad 'nough to take it; an' if you try any such control or you won't not off so easy." Sophia work again, you won't get off so easy." So listened for a reply or Sam Brightman' trenting footsteps, but there was dead silence from below.

"Sam Brightman," said Sophia, "you speak," She trembled; a vague alarm was srealing over her. "Sam Brightman," she called again imperatively; but there was no re-sponse. Sophia backed into her room, keepsponse. Sophia backed into her room, keep-ing her eyes toward the stairs. She shut the door, and put a chair against it—there was no lock; then she lighted a lamp, and dressed herself. She even smoothed her hair, and looked scrutinizingly in the glass. "I look awful pale" she mattered.

Then she took the lamp and opened the door cautiously. Everything was still. Sophia stole softly to the head of the stairs, held up the lamp before her, and peered down.

There indeed lay Sam Brightman, poor, old free-lauce in the poverty and labor question, buddled in a forlorn heap at the foot of the "Land sakes," gasped Sophia, "he's in a fit."

She went down, her knees shook under her; she set the lamp on the stairs, bent over Sam Brightman, and touched his shoulders gin-gerly. "Sam," she called loudly at him, "Sam, what's the matter?"

Sam's face upturned Insensibly to the lamplight, was ghastly. Sophia trembled violently. "Sam," she called imperatively with her shaking voice. "Sam, be you dead? Sam Brightman, for the land sakes, do speak to me." Sam did not stir. Sophia stepped over him, and ran into the sitting room for the camphor bottle. She poured some over his forebend, and held her handkerchief wet with it to his nose. "Smell of it," she panted. "Sam, smell of it. Be you dead, Sam, be you dead? Land sakes, what shall I do,"

Som gasped faintly and tried to rise. She pushed him back. "Lay still," said she agitatedly. "lay still, you've had a bad spell, but you're comin' to. Lay still, smell of this camplifie."

"Where be 1?" mooned Sam Brightman, looking with piteous bewildered eyes on hers.

"Right here in my house—Sophia's. Don't you know? Don't you remember? You've you know? Don't you remember? You've known me ever since we were children. You're right here, don't you worry." Sam Brightman was, for the time, past worrying. He shut his eyes, and lay with his mouth open, parting feebly. "Sam Brightman, look here," said Sophia, suddenly. He opened his eyes wearily.

How long is it since you had anythin to

"I believe you're staryin'," said Sophia arply. "I never heard of such doin's. A sharply. "I never heard of such dots s. A pretty piece of work I should call it. Don't you know no better than to do this way? Now

Sophia went burriedly into her parlor bedroom, and got some pillows and comfortables; then she arranged Sam Brightman as easily as she could at the foot of the stairs. She kept enjoining him not to move lest he should faint again; and he showed little disposition His last stress of mind had quite exhausted him for the time; nobody would ever know how little be had eaten, and how much he had worried for the last few months.

Sophia Hurd was methodical in all her ways at night she always left her kitchen fire ready to light in the morning. Now all she had to do was to touch a match to it, and set on a little kettle of broth left over from her chicken When it was not she countled it into a sowl, and carried it, with a spoon, to poor Sam Brightman.

Now you jest set up, an' drink this," said she; and she might have been Sam's mother from her tone.

Sam mode an effort to sit up, but sank back again. "Can't you set up?" said she. You try, you've get to drink this, or you can't get home. I never see such work."
Sam made another effort and fell back.

" For the land sokes," said Sophia, and her voice had an odd quizzical tenderness, open your mouth.

She extended a spoonful of the hot broth, the fragrant stemm of it came in Sam's face; he shut his lips right.

"You open your mouth, this minute," said

Sophia, and he opened it: Sophia sed the whole bowl of broth, spoonful by spoonful, to Sam Brightman, and, as she did so, an expression came into her sharp, homely face which had never been there before, which her friends would not there before, which her friends would not have recognized as hers, nor she, had she seen herself in the glass. It was the look of a mother feeding a child, and with it a cursous averted effect, as if she were turning shame-facelly from her own eyes. When the bowl was drained she got up from her knees, and carried it into the kitchen hurriedly.

"There, I guess you'll feel better now," said she with a half laugh. "You lay still a few minutes longer, an' I guess you can get up."

She got a basket down from the top shelf in the pantry, and packed it with food. She set in one of the chicken pies at the bottom. Presently she heard Sam staggering into the Presently she heard Sam staggering into the room. "Here's a basket for you to take home," said she. "I never heard of such work." She did not turn her head. Sam made no reply. He went straight toward the door, unbolted and opened it, and the night air trashed in. air rushed in.

"Ain't you goin' to take this basket?" asked

Sophia. Sam made no reply; he stepped out weakly. Sophia followed after him with the basket, If you ain't equal to carryin' o' it. I'll go with you," said size. "I shan't be afraid to with you," said she. "I shan't be afraid to come home; it's as light as day, and the neighbors are all abed, so there won't nobody see

"I don't want your basket," said Sam, with feeble gruffness, pushing it back as she ap-

"Well, I should call it pretty work. Why don't you want it? Had you ruther have stole it?"

Yes, I had," said Sam, flercely. He went "Yes, I lind," said Sam, hercely. He went feebly down the walk, and she stood looking after him. "Hullo, Sophi," the parrot sung out with a wild flutter, when she went in. She unpacked the basket, and set the food carefully away. Then she locked the door, put a stick in the window whereby Sam Brightman had entered, and went to bed again.

She could not sleep any, and heard the town clock when it struck the hours, until morning. She got up at the first light and dressed herself again. When she brushed her hair before the glass, she ran out her tongue nod looked at it anxiously. "It looks feverish," said she. She made herself a bowlful of sage ten for her breakfast; it was her pannera; she had been brought up to consider it a salutary and com-forting drought; and this morning she really felt ill, she thought. So seldom had her de-termined calm been infringed upon, that its disturbance impressed her like a real bodily

After she had finished the sage tea, she heated the oven and put in the turkey to roust, then cleaned the vegetables for dinner. At eleven o'clock the rich odor of the rousting turkey permeated the whole house; the vegeta-bles were steaming. She sat down by the kitchen window and reflected.

The bells were ringing for meeting; every body in the village was going, except the housewives who needed to stay at home to prepure the Thankagiving dinner. It was a pleas-ant morning: the wind had gone down, and there was a heavy white frost; the yard and the fields were covered with it, the dry grass bent stiffly, and the rocks showed shining silver white surfaces.

"If I sent anythin' over there to ent," said Sophia, "I dunno what Sam would say. I don't darse to."

There was no sound but the hissing and bubbling of the boiling vegetables. The par-rut's eye, set like a yellow pearl in his spleudid mass of green feathers, watched her keenly.

"I dunno, if I put on my other dress an' my best bonnit, an' went over an asked 'em all to dinner, as they'd resent it," said Sophia; an' I could get Sam to one side an' tell him to keep dark about last night, an' that I'd be glad to let him have the wood in my woodland to cut; it'il last him all winter.

The bell had long stopped ringing, there was a hum of Thanksgiving in the church, and all the village dinners were fast cooking, when Mrs. Packer saw Sophia Hurd arrayed in her best dress, and coat and bonnet, going down the street.

"I'd like to know where she's goin'." said. "It's too late for moeth," an' I don't b'lieve she's invited anywheres to dinner."

Mrs. Packer benceforth cooked her dinner with one eye on the window. First she saw Sophia return learnedly; then, when it was ime for meeting to be out Sam Bri man and his wife, his daughter, and the three little white-headed children, all keeping step as if to some gladness in their hearts, like a little gala procession, and they all went in Sophia Hurd's front gate.

MR. HOWELLS' NEW NOVEL

THE NOVELIST'S STORY OF GIRL-LIFE TO BEGIN IN THE NEXT JOURNAL

IE editor of THE LADIES' HOME JOURNAL takes pleasure in announcing that in the next (December) Issue the publi-cation of the new novel by William Dean Howells will begin. The story Dean Howells will begin. The story is one of girl-life in New York City, light and gay throughout, and in his delineation of the structeles of a talented western girl who leaves home of refinement to pass through an eventful career in the metropolis, Mr. Howells has surpassed all his precious efforts. As he him-self says, in a note to the editor, "It is about the pretriest thing I have done." The story has received eareful study and attention at the lands of Mr. Frank O. Small, the artist, and a series of beautiful illustrations will arcompany the instalments. It will doubtless prove to be the most fiscinating story, in remantic interest, local coloring and reflection of the girl nature, ever printed.

A SONG OF THANKSGIVING

BY CLINTON SCOLLARD

THANKSGIVING! Thanksgiving! Of yore. In the youth of the nation, When the harvest had yielded its store There was feast and oblation. Or when danger had lifted its hand, From the lips of the living There rang through the length of the land A Thanksgiving | Thanksgiving |

Our home was a wilderness then With the floods to enfold it: To-day with its millions of men, We rejoice to behold it, From the sea to the surge of the sea, We have all for a treasure: We are blest in the promised To-be In a manifold measure.

War flaunts not a red pennon now. For the olive is regal; Like birds that are twin, on one bough Sit the dove and the eagle. The clash of the conflict that cleft We in sorrow remember. But the fire of the great feud has left In the ash scarce an ember.

For the fruit of the time of our toil; For whate'er we have fought for; Whether born of the brain or the soil Be the meed we have sought for; For the gifts we have had from His hand Who is Lord of all living, Let there ring through the length of the land A Thanksgiving! Thanksgiving!

THE PRACTICAL NEEDS OF LIFE

BY GRACE DODGE

ONEY plays an important part in life and yet how few girls know its value. Even those who are young wage-earners do not realize the real value of money. A mother once proudly boasted on her daugh-ter's wedding-day," E--- has never had to do anything. I have laid out her dresses each day and told her just what to wear and do." This "E--had never shopped or had money to account for, and did not know whether four-buston gloves should cost fifty cents or five dollars. Is it any wonder that that girl had hard experiences to go through, and that the young husband and the home had to suffer as well? She had to learn the a b c of accounts and practical affairs when a woman with many cares, instead of learning them with the other rudiments of her education when a child.

When manual training with its domestic economy department of cooking and scaling was being urged as a necessary part of public school training, teachers and wise men brought forward the argument, "That it is not needful for mothers to teach these things." From every city came the answer, "Mothers do not teach these branches, and our girls are being brought up without practical bousehold training." One summer a ludy had two hundred and sixty girls from offices, stores and factories to board during two weeks' vacation. At the end of the summer she found that but nine of the number knew how to make a bed, and many of them made it a boast that they "never had made a bed in their lives." Some did not even know whether sheet or blanket should be put on first. And these were not destitute girls, but such as represent our self-respecting wage-caroers—girls who were boarders, paying a fuir price, and yet who were expected to make their own beds. Mothers had not trained them. There are hundreds of bright, intelligent girls of fifteen, sixteen, eighteen, and even older, who have never sewed, and do not know whether a thimble should go on their thumb or forefinger. What kind of wives and mothers are they to make? Mothers ought to realize that daughters need to be trained for their probable career of housewife and mother, as well as that sons must be apprenticed for a trade, only in the girls' case, mothers, it is your duty to act as the trainer.

Many girls who are now well supported and cared for by father and mother, will by and by be thrown on their own resources, and it cannot be known now who these girls are to All girls, therefore, should be taught to Also it is necessary TOUROUS. they should learn some one thing, at least, that may bring them an income if needful. One art thoroughly mastered is better than dozens of so-called accomplishments each half learned. Many a girl has supported herself and been saved because she knew how to cook well, and when the trial came could turn her hand to making cake, or even biscuit.

Physical training should be treated by a physician, but even here hints may be thrown out which will prove helpful to some mother. Be a practical example and teacher of common sense, that most uncommon of all senses. Rubbers and waterproofs are important matters little considered. Thick shors, light skirts, warm jackets, healthy food, regular hours and out-of-door exercise are all important. A nervous, dyspeptic girl or woman with weak back or lungs is a trial in any home. Has-tic home such through consistences or lack she become such through carelessness, or lack of knowledge? No girl wants to wear an ugly dress, but suitability and beauty can both be considered. Healthful food if poorly cooked and unappetizing is worse than that which is not so healthful and yet is well prepared. The reply of the artist as to how he mixed his paints. claims the attention of all lovers of llowers. It has been very prettily styled "the queen of Autumn." The honor is well bestowed; she reigns so gracefully that she is constantly increasing the number of her devoted subjects. At this season of the year, when chrysan-themum exhibitions are held all over the country, chrysanthemum dinners and wed-dings are the fashionable "fad."

THE FLOWER AT A DINNER

WHEN a chrysanthemum dinner is held

W HEN a chrysanthenum dinner is held in a private house, the dining-room is seldom claborately decorated. A touch of color on the sideboard and mantel, a few palms judiciously placed, and a little green on the mirror, caught up with several long-stemmed chrysanthenums, is in good taste. The accompanying illustration is taken from a photograph of the round table that was awarded the first prize at the New awarded the first prize at the New York Chrysanthemum Show last

At first glance, the impression is as though the table were over-crowded; this, however, was not the case, for, with the exception of plates and silver, the entire table was set with crystal glass, giving a brilliant light and beautiful effect.

There are many things to be said in favor of a round table, and especially so if it be not so large as to suggest any impropriety in talking nerosa it.

Very pretty effects can be pro-duced with a round table having a hollow center. A false bottom is made about a foot below the table. This may be partially filled with moss and long-stemmed chrysanthemans, arranged very carelessly.
Small fairy lamps may be placed at different heights, a little below the most generally used.

tall vases on the ends are most effective;
large, long-stemmed chrysanthenums can be ladies are placed at the base of the large vases.

A plateau, filled with chrysanthenums, bows, monograms, made of chrysanthenums, can be used with good effect.

A bowl or vise may be placed in the center of the table, the bowl resting on china silk, gracefully arounced.

White and green effects can be most successfully produced with chrysanthemoms.

A few sprays of adjuntum farleyense, thrown on the white cloth, with a number of large chrysanthemums, are very effective.

If you have a fero dish, and do not wish an elaborate center piece, a few long-stemmed chrysanthemums arranged among the ferns will answer very well.

FOR AN EVENING PARTY

W HEN arranging chrysanthemoms for an W HEN arranging chrysauthemous for an evening party, it is wise to study simplicity. Do not put too many in one receptacle, but rather depend upon their individual beauty of form, color and grace of stem to give a pleasing effect. Bring them in conjunction with anything Japanese that you may have—vases, screens or fains.

A few long-stemmed chrysanthemums can be drawn through the sticks of folding fans, which can be placed at corners of mirrors, over pictures at the side lights. Many places will suggest themselves to one when they are decorating a room. Place some beautiful specimens in unexpected places; the little surprises often give pleasure.

If the evening party is more formal, or in the nature of a reception, the decoration should be more cluborate, and even here a few of the delicate touches are always appreciated. A few palms and chrysanthemans should be placed back of the party that receives. The chandelier and mantel should be decorated with chresanthemans, with their natural leaves. The musicians can be partially hidden by either Japanese screens or blooming chrysanthemans plants.

The ladies who receive should carry clusters of chrysanthemums, very loosely arranged, and if refreshments are served, some gracefully arranged chrysanthemums should be on the table.

At a children's party, little clusters of chrys-anthemums can be arranged in baskets, or on fans, or in one large table design. These clusters can be given to the children as they are about to depart, a custom that never fails to give the little ones pleasure.

In regard to wearing chrysanthemums as corsage bouquets at parties, receptions, or on the atreet, every woman is a law unto ber-

CHRYSANTHEMUM WEDDINGS

MANY of the general suggestions given in the June Journal in the article. "Flowers at June Weddings," will hold go for chrysauthemum weddings. All of the flowers worn or carried should be chrysauthemum excepting, possibly, the bride's bouquet, which should be made of orchids, lilies of the valle.

or white roses. The abundance of chrysan-theniums in the market at this time offers many opportunities for elaborate decorations.

Many of the smaller flowers can be gotten a very little cost; and if they be arranged loosely in the church and house many beautiful effects can be produced.

many beautiful effects can be produced.

At the house it would be well to have a few especially fine specimens arranged in vases and placed in the most conspicuous places. Frequently, designs made of chrysauthennums are used at weldings. If they be desired, there are no better flowers of which to make them. Among the most popular are the wedding bells, which are frequently made in different sizes to represent chimes. They are generally hung over the place where the bridal party receives. Ropes can be made of white chrysanthennums and gracefully arranged back of the bridal party. White ribbons are often used for the same purpose. Monograms can be made of white and pink chrysanthennums. Love knots, wish bones, canoples, umbrellas, balls, etc., are frequently made.

Chrysanthenum plants can be used with good effect among the groups of palms if they be raised from the floor by placing them on stands. The effect will often be better if you cut the string and pull out the stakes that have been used while growing. This allows the flowers to fall in more natural positions.

The rich, yellow chrysanthepositions.

The rich, yellow chrysantheniums have often been used with good effect for golden weddings, as other flowers of so rich a yellow are difficult to obtain.

Of recent years, chrysanthemuns have undergone such marvelons improvements under the skillful hands of the cultivators, that it is

hands of the cultivators that it is very difficult to speak intelligently of the prices. They can be had, however, at any time during the chry sant he mu in season at a very small cost. If they be arranged judiciously, and not massed too much, pretty effects can be had for very little money; while if you wish flowers of greater size and beauty, they can be had at such perfection that could not have been dreamed of ten years ago. The size is attained by what is known as "disbudding;" that is, when a number of flowers naturally grow on one stem, all but one are sacrificed in the bud, allowing all of the energies of that stem to go to one flower. Plants thus treated also get more nursing and, consequently, bring much larger prices.

is always wise, before selecting flowers, to determine whether natural or artificial light is to be used, as the color of many flowers undergoes a decided change under artificial light.

The guest's name should be written on the card, and placed at the plate which designates

If clusters are to be placed at each guest's plate, they should be rather small, so that if the guest should care to wear them she may do so. A beautiful cluster can be made by using three or four of the white feathery chry-santheroum, "Mrs. Alpheus Hardy," with a delicately colored erchid, tied with ribbon to

At times, very large clusters of chrysan-thenoms are grouped in the center, or at the ends of the table; these should be tied with ribbons of appropriate color. A pretty effect can be produced by leaving one end of the ribbon long enough to extend to each guest's alute on which her recovering by pointed plate, on which her name can be painted. When the hostess wishes to rise, she draw-her bouquet toward her, and suggests that her friends do likewise.

A very pretty arrangement for the center of the table is to make a wreath of chrysanthe-mums, putting a mirror in the center, and on this a cut-glass bowl filled with the long-stemmed flowers.

Wire should not be used when it can be avoided. Individual vases may be used, but only the choicest flowers should be arranged in them. As these flowers are in water, and, consequently, perfectly fresh, they will be very acceptable to your guests to take home.

A rather subdued artificial light is generally preferred. The color of the light shades should always harmonize with the flowers.

Natural chrysanthemums are often pinned on lamp and candelabra shades when the heat is not too great.

A few suggestions, however, may not go amiss.

Much depends upon the costume. If a belt Much depends upon the costume. If a belt is worn, the largest cluster of chrysanthemums can be worn there. If a little jacket, with a lapel and collar cut like a man's cost, the prettiest way is to wear one large chrysanthemum in the buttonhole. If it is a cold, frosty November morning, and a muff is carried, pin a few on the muff; if a severely plain tailor-made gown is worn, several handsome chrysanthemums can be carried in the hand with the portemonnaie.

THE WELL-BRED GIRL IN SOCIETY

By Mrs. Burton Harrison

FIRST PAPER-THE YOUNG GIRL AND DANCING is my purpose in taking up the sub-ject of young eet of young womanhood in its relation to well-bred society, to treat it not in the manner not in the manner of a literary essay, nor yet of a guide to etiquette, but to set forth simply what observation has suggested as some aims to be kept in view, and some mistakes to be avoided by a girl who wishes to be judged by the standards that prevail in the conventional life of large cities in America.

life of large cities in America.

If one were to accept the oracles sent forth by certain newspaper correspondents writing from New York, our débutantes might be ranked by the reading public with athletic champions in training for boxing matches. What these young women are supposed to eat and drink, details of their bran baths, alcohol baths, massage treatment, exercise during the hours when they are not engaged in the display of their physical accomplishments before the world, are there enumerated to a degree that ceases to amuse, and comes dangerously near dispussing the recipients of dangerously near disgusting the revipients of the confidence. Next, we hear of how many cotillons a week the young lady dances; how many functions and dispers she attends; her meteoric course from one scene of gayety to another; the methods employed by her backers and trainers to reciterate exhausted nature in order that she may go at it again—not to speak of the amount of costly millinery con-sidered essential for her various appearances and all told in a way to make the casual reader throw down his journal and thank Heaven he lass not a daughter to bring out, or a wife to seek in the glittering ranks of Eastrion

Of this alleged type of the American girl I must avow myself ignorant. I have never met her except in the columns of a sensation-seeking newspaper. My impression is that such a creature would not enjoy herself overmuch if she were to dawn before the startled amon it she were to down before the startled gaze of conservative entertainers. And I pro-test against her being accepted by people at a distance as a specimen of American civiliza-tion. She has wrought mischief enough in young imaginations who follow her from after and model themselves according. afar and model themselves accordingly.

A GIRL'S FIRST GLIMPSE OF SOCIETY

MORE pleasant to contemplate is our famil-M. in modern débutante; the home bred maiden who, arriving at the age of eighteen or thereabout, is introduced by her parents to their acquaintances, to thenceforth take her place beside her mother as hoetess, and as participant in hospitalities extended to the family. If we look up the specifical definition of society it will be found to be not only "the more cultivated portion of any community in its social relations and influences," but also "those who mutually give and receive formal entertainments." The first step in the conventional exchange of town life is some function, either evening party, or a general "ten" in the afternoon—the latter the more common society. To the greater portion of the company expected to be present, the débutante is practically a stranger. With the parents of the young people of her age and set she may have been familiar more or less, and her progress may have been by them watched out of thest "Lifffench" varied that is semesiment the ing modern débutante; the home-bred have been familiar more or less, and her prog-ress may have been by them watched out of that "difficult "period that is sometimes the despoir of guardians, who know not what manner of thing it will being forth. For the crucial test of her introduction into full-fledged society, the poor girl must needs equip herself in a shining armor of conven-tionality; must step neither to the right nor to the left of the line prescribed by custom; must, above all, repress her preferences in the matter of companionship, and mele out civility in equal share to all who are pre-sented to her. What wonder that she often drawls, rather than welcomes, her great occa-sion? That it is an experience to be endured, sion? That it is an experience to be endured, even though her way be strewn, as it generally is, with flowers, must be admitted.

AT HER FIRST LARGE BALL

THE next ordenl, and this, especially in New York, is a serious one, to which many an eye-witness may be summoned, is the first large ball. Old-fashioned girls in the less conventional portions of our country used spoken of as finding the occasion a scene of dazzling gayety that sent them reluctantly homeward after dancing out the stars. The fin de riccle maiden of our large cities has au-other tale to tell. Unless, indeed, she shall have been brought out with extraordinary forethingly and diplomatic preparation; any-less her family is known as one profuse in giving sutertainments of the "smart" sort; or she is boralded as the helices of many shekels; or unless the fates have gifted her with the branty that strikes all beholders speechless a prize mostly appropriated by beroines of fairy tales—the débutante is ant to feel more pang than pleasure while standing with re-luctant feet where the brook and river meet.

Take her, arrived in the dressing-room at the ball, a room crowded with strange faces, or unfamiliar ones. She sees the breaking up into eliques of women and girls who have in-terests in common which she does not slare. The conviction that her lovely new track, praised to the echo by home admirers, is but a pale glimmer in all this splendor, depresses her at the outset. She recalls the bustle and flutter, the confidences and chatter of the girls' dressing-room at the dancing class last year. There she knew every one, had her own little ring of satellites, and feared not to relax into mischief and merriment. The grave countenances of her fellow débutantes reflect her own. It seems to all of them so vast so instinces-like, so self-alcorbed, this struogle her own. It seems to all of them so vast, so business-like, so self-absorbed, this struggle for pleasure they call society. How can a simid maiden assert herself in such a multi-tude? What can she do or be, to justify ber introduction to the scene? Above all, how maintain herself, not to reveal her faint heart in the fruy? As well may a blossom dropped into a mill stream try to push its way against the current.

By and by, out of chaos emerges order in her ideas, and, the plunge made, she tries to adapt herself to the requirements of the hour. She finds that, once in the ball-room, many of the confident ones, who have on its threshold looked her over and tried to look ber down, have no better chance than she. The occusion becomes an universal exchange, a market in which wares are offered and accepted or passed by for whatever is more attractive to the seeker. Oftentimes a girl's youth and freshness and her rendiness to be amused attract when self-consciousness and labored vivacity send men to the right-about. But to give points in the art of pleasing is beyond the ope of this paper.

DEPORTMENT OF THE BALL-ROOM

A. PEATURE of ball-room life, which, in the eyes of débutantes and chaperone nlike, calls aloud for redress, is in order of discussion here. One hears everywhere the com-plaint that a woman, old or young, may not stir from her seat to get supper, or to avoid a draught, or to change places for a better point of view, without being annexed to the arm of some member of the selecting sex, for whom she must wait, or whistle, to use the ancient, pungent phrase. Hard as this unwritten law is to the chiers, who see themselves doomed to dependence on callow youths, the age, it may be, of their sons, for the privilege of crossing a crowded bit of parquet floor, it is doubly so to the girls who must wait the pleasure of these sultans of the hour to rise from the seats these sultans of the hour to rise from the seats into which their healthy activity has been enchained. If they might only fraternize with each other, cross the ball-room band in band, go into supper likewise, and, better than all, dance together, without proclaiming themselves wall flowers, what a merry set our débutantes would be. Untrammeled by absurd necessity, the girls who now sit, often grave and spiritless, heside their protectors, would then take flight, chirping and clustering like a flock of birds. As it is, who has not seen the unnatural spectacle of these young creatures bolding back from conversation with each other, bravely suppressing young, waiting and gazing with sad eyes upon the pageant of a other, bravely suppressing yawns, waiting non gazing with sad eyes upon the pageant of a dance which they are not bidden to join because the men are not so plentiful as the women. During a recent season of revelry in New York, it was no uncommon incident for girls whose carriages had been ordered late to be seen re-tring to the dressing room to wait, because carriages had need ordered late to be seen re-tiring to the dressing-room to wait, because partners were not forthcoming for the cotillon. And it is in New York, especially, that this lack of dancing men is patent. Numbers of young fellows, forced by the nature of their employment to keep early hours, make no pretence to keep up with the mad rush of society after midnight. The oldsters, who have danced down the generations, with a limited annels of very ventiful appropriets of limited supply of very youthful supporters of the salistory art, carry the burden of the bail.

TWO MISTAKES WELL TO AVOID

A GREAT and most patent error in taste is the habit of monopolizing the man who has tarried to pay his compliments to a girl in passing, until he and all lookers-on are made aware of a certain apprehension on her part lest be escape. A severe, but useful, lesson was rest ne escape. A severe, but useful, lesson was conveyed to a very young girl recently, who to an old friend of her father's family approach-ing under these conditions to give her gracious salutation, exhibited such evident nervousness in answer that the gentleman laid a hand or in answer that the gentleman laid a hand on the young fellow's arm and remarked with pleasant emphasis, "There, my dear, I have him safe and he cannot get away. Now you may go on telling new what you began to say," A fashion safe to stamp a young girl in general society as but ill-equipped with knowl-edge of good form, is that of "vanishing" in company with her attendant after a dance and remarking in unframembal corners are and remaining in unfrequented corners un-til remark is thereby created. Such is the young woman whose chaperone is in contin-ual speculation as to ber whereabouts, or else in active exercise to fine there. She is no doubt often innocent of intention to offend, but at large and mixed entertainments the better part of wisdom in a woman is to keep in view of her fellows. A witty Frenchwoman, Mnse, de Girardin, once wrote: "Amuse yourselves, de Graram, once wrote: "Amise your wings in the broad light of day. Avoid shadows in which suspicion bides." The "vanishing woman" act, made famous by a clever Hun-garian magician in fashionable séances in drawing-noons last season, should be limited drawing-rooms last season, should be limited in performance to a platform in full view of the audience. The prompt return of a young woman to the side or vicinity of her chaper-one after dancing is not only a graceful and well-bred action, but offerds an opportunity to the man, who too often is embarrassed in this respect, to withdraw and fulfill some other engagement.

MANNERISMS OF THE DANCE

"ONSPICUOUS mannerisms in dancing are offensive to good form. I refer to certain tricks of holding the left arm and hand, of carrying the train of the dress (which should be of what is called "dancing length," and then be forgotten otterly), of dipping the knees when waltzing, etc. These habits, contracted through heedlessness, perhaps, have been seen to mar the otherwise charming grace of manifens whose worth and beauty called atmaidens whose youth and beauty called at-tention to their movements on the floor. A tention to their movements on the floor. A dancing master in New York, whose pupils are known throughout Europe for their ad-mirable form, would never tolerate an ap-proach to either affectation or hoydenism among the young tadies of his classes. Most of these girls had afterward occasion to dis-cover that what he thus tought them. cover that what he thus taught them was of the first importance in shaping the verdict of the jury of clipperones, who, sitting on the benches around ball-room walls, make or mar a maiden's claim to place in the front ranks of good society.
One can touch here with but the dip of a swallow upon the matter of gowns worn anduly low-ent in dancing. So obvious is the offence of this fashion against a woman's finest feelings of propriety that it would seem hardly requisite to lay down laws by which to control it. A girl so equipped in dencing, ap-pears, more than at any other time, to the eye of the casual looker-on, to challenge criticism that, could she read minds, would dye her cheek with maidenty blushes. The dress-makers, often to blame in sending home at the has moment bodies so tightened in the seams as to make the wearers miserable with the consciousness of unintended display, should be controlled in this respect more stringently by their customers. It is quite presible, by a judicious management of darts and seams, to obviate this most inartistic as well as offen-sive cut of décolleté gowns.

SMALL talk in a ball-room, so often decried, would seem to be as much in place there as music, lights and evening clothes. Subas music, lights and evening clothes. Subjected to the interruptions of greeting friends and changing partners, a girl can hardly be asked to key her conversation to a very intellectual pitch. An effort in this direction might run the risk of meeting the misinterpretation of the undergraduate from New York in response to an inquiry, during a pause in dancing, of a young lady from Boston: "Have you read 'Kant'?" she asked. "You mean 'Don't,' don't you?" was the artless answer. That on such occasions small talk may be bandied lightly and entertainingly, without frivolity or ill-nature in personalities, is the golden mean we may safely strive to reach. strive to reach.

[Mrs. Harrison's second paper in her series of "The Well-Bred Girl in Society" will appear in the next (December) JOUNSAL, and will treat "A Young Girl's Dress in Society," taking up such phases of the question as the distinguishing marks of good dress; the social code of the low-cut gown; when to wear gloves and bounds; the matter of jeweis; artifices of the toilel; use of scents and flowers, and other little points in a girl's toilette upon which often binge the after-enjoyment of her social pleasures.]

good voices. I know very well that this statement will be questioned by many people, but it represents the opinion of the most successful singers, as of the most advanced teachers. If one measures the truth of beliefs by the results obmeasures the trith of beliefs by the results obtained from them, what belief can have a more secure stronghold upon credulity than this? I have seen the smallest and weakest of voices developed into tones of strength, parily and sweetness by a proper cultivation and an intelligent use of method. Method is, or should be the great test of ability. We have so many beautiful voices which receive our homage because of their natural beauty, not because of the training and work which may have been expended on them, that we are apt to lose sight of the competative values of method and voice. The latter wears out, the former is perennial. In times of ill health, when the voice cannot be at its best, a good method will carry one through the nost difficult tasks of singing. I know, in my own cult tas nging. case, where I have suffered much from ill health, that there have been hundreds of times when nothing but my conscious security in my ability to sing, rather than in my voice, has enabled me to get through my parts with-

A naturally beautiful voice is a beautiful thing, and a gift to be appreciated and cared for "reverently, discreally and advisedly," but it is a gift which is not given to every one. Proper cultivation, however, and, what is synonymous with it, a right method, can do as nuch and more, without much natural voice than the most beautiful voice without them, The moral of all this is, therefore, secure a good reacher, and then work with your teacher. The best teacher is not the one who, at the first lesson, will give you a solo and teach you to sing, after his fashion, "twenty songs in ten lessons." It is, rather, the one who, commencing with tone production, develops, one by one, the notes of your voice intil each one is rerfect of over applify and appoint. one is perfect, of oven quality and quantity, and under your complete control. This will be the work of time, of patience and of care; but the result will fully justify your pains. Having your voice under control, solo and part singing will be a matter merely of resulting and of attention with your Archyon will ing, and of attention with you. And you will be, what so many singers are not (I am speaking of professional as well as of home singers), a finished artist.

THE PERFUMES OF FRANCE

BY LUCY H. HOOPER

HE French are renowned for their products in perfumery as well as for those in the lines of silks and wines. The names of Lubin, of Piver, and of Guerlain are famed throughout the liabitable globe for their preparation of delicate odors in an infinite variety of forms. Yet they have never been able to create any perfume that will cope with two of the staple acents of commerce, the cologne water, of Germany and the English lavender water. HE French are renowned water.

Now, as perfumes form so large a feature in the commerce of France, and are produced in such large quantities, one would naturally imagine that they are manufactured wholesale in great establishments especially devoted to their preparation. Such is not the case. The delicate odors of scented flowers require for their preparation. Such is not the case. The delicate odors of scented flowers require for their capture and insprisonment a pseculiar treatment. They must be extracted from the parent blossons while the petals are still fresh, and to develop the properties of these flowers the heat of a southern sun is necessary.

These immense plantations exist in almost every department of the south of France, but the Riviera is especially devoted to this type of dainty agriculture. Grasse, Nice and Cannes and the neighboring villages provide the greater part of the perfumes of commerce. Each city has its special product. Nice supplies violets and crange blossoms, as does also Cannes, and the latter place is also famous for its roses and tuberoses and space, and flowers. The quantity of orange blossoms gathered annually on the Riviera amounts to the astonishing weight of one million and a quarier pounds. After that one learns without surprise that the violet crop of Nice is 50,000 pounds per annuals.

Similar plantations to those of the Riviera exist in England for the cultivation of lavender and mint. The two principal points are at Hitchinx, in Hertford, and at Mitcham, in der and mint. The two principal points are at Hitchinx, in Hertford, and at Mitcham, in nt Hitchinx, in Heritord, and at Mitcham, in Surrey. Italy supplies orris root and berga-mot, and Sicily, orange and lemon, those two fruits being largely employed in the prepara-tion of performery. The yellow portion of the rind is grated very fine and is then subjected to great pressure, by which process the essen-tial oil is forced out. The grated rind is en-closed in bugs of haircloth before being sub-mitted to the ress. The lignid thus produced mitted to the press. The liquid thus produced is mixed with the watery juices of the rind, but it is suffered to stand for a short time, and the oil then rises to the top and can easily be removed. Flowers are treated after a far more cluborate fashdon, their scent being extracted either by distillation or by maceration, or by the process known as "enfleurage," which last is the favorite method employed by the famous perfumer Lubin. It consists in arrangblossoms in shallow boxes, the bottoms of which are formed of glass and covered with a half inch layer of fresh animal fat. The method known as maceration is to smother the flowers in a mixture of lard and mutton or beef tallow. In both these forms of pre-paration the grease employed absorbs the scent of the flowers, one kind alone being used in each instance.

The flower-laden grease used in each of these each instance.

The flower-laden grease used in each of these forms of preparation is afterward subjected to immense pressure in presses specially prepared for the process, to force out every particle of the fit from the masses of blossoms. When it is found not to be sufficiently perfumed a fresh mass of flowers is added to it and the process is gone all over again. Another and more subtle method of extracting the odors is that proposed by M. Piver. This is to pass a stream of air through a vase filled with fresh flowers, and then through a second vessel containing liquid grease in which flat glass dises are kept constantly revolving by machinery. The oil loaded with the secut of the flowers, deposits its burden of sweetness in the grease. The highly-secuted pomades thus produced form the bases of the perfumery of commerce. They are packed in air-tight cans of tin with the evers soldered on, and in that state are transported to Paris. In the laboratories of the great perfumers they are treated with highly refined spirits of wine, and so are formed the dainty scents prepared to be sprinkled on a lady's handkerchief.

The meet potent of all perfumes, mutsk and attactor-roses, are imported from the East, but are too powerful, especially the former, for are too powerful, especially the former, for European tastes at the present day. It was, however, the favorite scent of that most elegant of royal ladies, the Empress Josephine. Down to the epoch of the destruction of the palace of St. Cloud by fireduring the war of 1870. palare of St. Cloud by fire-during the war of 1870, the dressing-room of the suite she had been wont to occupy, and especially the drawers of the bureau she had used, were redolent of that color. The mortar employed in building the new ruined Mosque of Zobeide at Tauris, was mingled with a quantity of musk by the piety of the masons engaged in the work, and to this day the surrounding almosphere is highly scented with it, especially when the sun shines upon the rains. This extraordinary durability of the scent-producing quality has brought about various interesting experiments.

A French chemist once exposed a small quantity of musk, after weighing it, to the rays of the sun in a closed room. After a cer-tain period the musk was again weighed, and was found to have lost no perceptible portion of its substance, even when the minutest tests were applied. Yet the scientific experimenter calculated that the volume of perfune evolved had amounted to no less a quantity than fifty-seven millions of particles. Hence a theory has arisen that the perfuming quality is not a substance, but is a series of vibrations that produce the same impression on the sense of smell that light does on the sight. Dy GOOGIO

CHAPTER IX

HE few following days were the oddest Kate had ever known, for a new at-mosphere seemed to be about her, and a new strength to

After that brief moment of support her. rapturous exaltation her sorrow came back upon her, clamoring for its old ascendancy; but though she paid it the tribute of many sad, sad hours, that ascendancy it could not sad, and hours, that ascendancy it could not get. It was now a thing subordinate. In her earnest and faithful search for ways in which she could be helpful to others there were found many cases of wants that she could fill and distresses she could relieve by both sympathy and alms, and she gave freely of the one and the other. Aunt Milly and her mother became her daily one and the other. Aunt Milly and her mother became her daily care and interest. She felt a deep gratitude to them for being the means of opening her eyes to the selfishness of her grief, which she now found hideous to look back upon. It was a very different thing from the active feeling that sparred her on to unremitting exertions for the relief of others, but it was griet still, in an altered form. It has been truly said that renunciation remains sorrow, though it is a sorstill, in an altered form. It has been truly said that renunciation remains sorrow, though it is a sorrow willingly borne, and Kate knew that this new-found strength and inspiration that had come to ber partook not of the nature of joy. But she was done with joy now. She had bidden it a brave farewell; her thoughts, indeed, ran often on the past, and the visions that they conjured up had power still to stab her beart with pain and summon to her eyes the ready tears; but now there was always at hand a solace for this pain, and, by looking round her, she saw so many causes for tears in other lives that she felt it base and cowardly to cry about herself. In those long walks to and fro, as she went on her errands of love and mercy, her self-communings passed into almost a face-to-face talk with God, as a man talketh with his friend. She told Him, with a full heart, that throbbed now for the pain of others rather than her own, how adoringly she thanked Him for the new-found grace of self-forgetfulness, and she begged Him, as a mark of favor and forgiveness, to send her much work to do for poor and suffering men and women and little children, and pledged herself, with ardent zeal, that whatever it might be she and pledged herself, with ardent zeal, that whatever it might be she zeal, that whatever it might be she would not shirk it.

One afternoon, at Aont Milly's cottage, a strange and piteons tale was told her. A party of emigrants, passing through the town on their way to their new home, had left one of their number ill at a house not far from the station. It was an old German woman, who had since broken out with a terrible emption, pronounced to be small-pox. So great was the panic that the poor family, who had willingly undertaken the charge in consideration of a liberal fee, had become thoroughly demoralized, and fled from the house, which no one was willing to enter. There were provisions enough to supply the woman for the charge in consideration of a liberal fee, had become sions enough to supply the woman for the present, and when last heard from she had been able to move about and serve berself, but that was early in the morning, and the person who had then ventured to go near the house—a negro woman who had had the disease herself, but utterly refused to go alone to nurse it—had looked in at the window and seen the old German woman lying on the bed, either in a swoon, or else too weak to move, or else dead. The awe-struck terror with which this last supposition was broughed re-vealed to Kate where the difficulty lay in getting this woman, who might have done without risk, to go to the rescue of the suf-

"Would you go and take care of her if some one went with you and helped you?"
she asked. "You should be well paid for it."

The woman agreed at once, saying that the doctor had sent for her that afternoon to go, but she" wasn't going to stay there by hers no, not for nobody!" Kate then accertained Kate then ascertained by no, not for nobody! "Kate themsecrtained by inquiry that Dr. Hale, an old physician known to her since childhood, had seen the patient, pronounced it a real case of small-jex, and ordered every one to keep away from the house except this woman, whom he had engaged as murse, and who had not laid the courage to tell him she would not go. He had then zone out into the country to see a very ill patient, satisfied that he had done the best he could for the poor emigrant.

Is there any one here who will go with this woman and stay there to-night? Kate, "for a good price, ten, twenty, thirty dollars? I will pay whatever you ask."

Everybody hung back, though the little group around Aunt Milly's hut included almost all the negro women at the settlement. Aunt Milly herself spoke first:

"Seem like somebody ought to go," she said. "Maybe, I'd make out to do it; but what'd become of mother if anything happened to me?"

"No, Aunt Milly; I wouldn't allow you to go," said Kate, much touched; "and, perhaps, all the rest of you have families who would suffer if you fell ill or died."

One by one they answered her, and proved

One by one they answered her, and proved

"No one must go who has others dependent on them," she said. "That would be wrong, instead of right. Come with me. Susan," she added, turning to the tall woman, whose deeply-scarred face was a frightful enough warning against the disease. "If you'll walk back to town with me, I think I can get some one to go with you."

even to berself, its loveliness was evident now, for she gazed, as if balf-pityingly, on its smooth fairness of skin, and the pure tints of its coloring. But that look passed quickly, and another—an expression of infinite, yearning love replaced it, as she hid her face in her hands, and said in a half-sobbing whisper:

"O my love, my darling, my darling! I wonder if you would care!"

She opened a drawer, and took from it a flat package that had been carefully folded in heavy paper, and fastened with great seals. Hurriedly breaking these, she drew forth a photograph, and lifting it to her lips kissed it repeatedly, while her tears fell thick upon it. She looked deep into the pictured eyes, and tender words, long forbidden to her, crowded each other on her lips. Then she thrust the picture into her pocket, and was tying on her veil, snying to herself in that piteous, half-sobbing way: "O, I wish he could know I thought of him—I'd like him to know that!" and then, catching sight of her dear little violin, she ran to her desk, and added these words to the letter to her aunt. "If anything happens to me, please give my violin to Mr. Talbot."

Then, hurriedly fastening her veil, she opened the door, and in the passage encountered Maria. To the good creature's surprise her beautiful young lady threw both arms around her, and clasped her close and right.

who has power to prevent me. I have neither father nor mother nor near relative to miss me if I should die. I have spent most of my life at a boarding-school, and my grandparents are not used to having me here, and it is doubtful if anybody else could be found who was in the same free condition. I was vaccinated only a short while ago for fear of exposure to small-pox while traveling, and I believe I am protected. I don't expect to take the disease, but if I do I am quite prepared for it. You are to go in now and see if the old woman is dead If she is, I will, of course, not run the risk of contagion for nothing. You, of course, are in no danger."

But Susan looked so frightened at the suggestion of making the investigation that Kate was half afraid she was going to run away and escape her altogether. She had divined, however, that her timidity took many forms, and she resolved to make it serve her purpose. She caught the woman sharply by the arm, and said, authoritatively:

"Put down that bag, and come with me," at the same time pulling her toward the house.

As they came near inarticulate sounds reached them, at which Susan was sufficiently reassured to say she would go in, finding the patient was not really dead.

"I will stand here," said Kate, stopping a few poces from the door, "while you look in and tell me what she is doing."

"Law, Miss Kate, she ain 'dead," said Susan a moment later from the open door, "She's a ole wonsan, an' her head's ez white ez snow, en she's lyin' thar, broke out thick with the small-pox, en cryin' fit to brek her heart."

with the small-pox, en cryin' fit to brek her heart."

As she finished speaking, Kate came quickly forward, and the next moment had passed her and en-tered the room. It was a sight to melt the handest heart on earth, and Kate's, which was one of the softest, yearned with such infinite pity over the white-baired old woman that she almost forgot, for a moment, the dread which, in spite of all she could do, had not been quite conquered. It was not half so much the fear of death as an intense shrinking from the rehalf so much the fear of death as an intense shrinking from the re-pulsive form of this disease, but when she saw the look of over-powering glad relief that came into the aged woman's eyes, as they caught sight of the heavenly friend-liness of that sweet, young face, every lingering vestige of self-con-sideration left her; and when those weak and withered hands, red with splotches and parched with fever, were held out to her, she did not shrink, but took them in her not shrink, but took them in her own, so cool and soft and fair, and held them with the tender touch of a dear daughter. She spoke to the woman comforting, encouraging words, but alas! it was all incomprehensible to her, and she, poor creature, shook her head and answered in her native tongue which to Kate was a senled language. The poor old creature's face, in spite of its disfigurement, was kindly and intelligent, and her coarse clothing showed a true German

With Susan's assistance Kate With Susan's assistance Kate lifted her into a more comfortable position, got a snowy fine white garment from her bag, and improvised a covering for her pillow, bathed her face and hands in tepid water, according to Susan's directions, which were her hest and only guide as to treatment, prepared her some food from the slight resources she found at hand, and in a little while had the satisand in a little while had the satis-faction of seeing that the patient

In a whispered conference with Susan Kate inquired when Dr. Hale would come again, and was told he was not to be expected before morning. It was the only chance of getting needed supplies for the invalid, and directions how to use them, and for that reason chiefly she repelled it, but there was no help for it. She made Susan busy herself with cleaning up the room and setting things in order, while the patient slept, and she saw to it that no noise was made, for she realized what sleep meant to the sufferer.

Twilight drew on and darkened into even-ing, but there was a lovely moon aloft, and its pure rays did not shun the pest-smitten cot-tage, but feil upon it with a lavish radiance that seemed to cleanse it within and without. Fortunately the weather was mild, and doors and windows could be left open; and for the same reason, the disease was not so violent form as Kate had heard it represented. Still, there was offense enough to every sense she possessed to make it, in spite of all, a trial not to be considered trivial to a girl of her fastidious habits. She knew well that it was not trivial, and thanked God, in her heart, that He had taken her at her word, and given her no light and easy task to do for Him, inas-much as it was being done to one of the least of his children.

CHAPTER X

THE experience of that night, awful as it was in many ways, had yet a quality in it that acted like a magic balm of comfort upon the sore and wounded heart that Kate had carried so long. To sit in that wretched place, and watch that poor sufferer, so old nand feeble, tossing on her bed of sickness, a stranger in a new and unfriendly world, and to be able, when she reached forth her shaking hand, to give her, a rand drink, in scother her fever-purched tonguel to fall her delication of legislates and kindness. presence of human sympathy and kindness,

"What madness has possessed you to do a thing like this?" exclaimed Dr. Hale.

The woman followed her, and the group stood looking after them a long time, wonder-ing who the rich young lady, with all her ney, would get for that dreadful work Kate walked onward in profound silence, very pale and serious looking, but with a rapid, resolute step. She made Susan wait, while, without summoning any one, she packed a large satchel with various things collected rapidly, wrote a brief note to ber grandmother, and another to Mrs. Owen, to be forwarded, as she said " in case anything happened," And then calling Susan, she told her to take the bag and go on ahead of her, say-ing she would soon catch up with her, and one of her mission. She watched Susan out of the gate, to be sure she had no conference with Maria; and, then, locking the doors, she fell upon her knees, upright, in the middle of the room, and begged God cornestly not to let her courage falter, to mete out to her a supply of strength equal to her will, and she could do all. "I had to do it," she cried in a whisper, as if speaking to some one close by.

"They all had some one to whom their lives were valuable and precious, and I had no one! My Father, I feel that it is right! Christ, pray for me that my strength fail not!"
Then she rose, and walked over to the mirror, and stood there, resting her hands on the dressing table, and looking scrutinizingly at the lovely face reflected before her. Perhaps,

"Dear, good, patient Maria!" she said, "you've been so good to me. I love you dearly, Maria. Tell me you love me; I want to hear you say that you love me, I want your love, Maria."

"You does know I does love you, you dar-lin' angel!" said Maria; "but what mek you ax me 'bout it now, Miss Kate? Whar you gwine?"

"I'm going over to see a poor woman," Kate said, "There's a note for my grandmother on my desk; but don't give it to her till tea-time.

"Ain' you comin' back home to supper?"
Ain' you comin' back home to supper?"
Aid Maria. "You gwine but yourself, mum, ang o' all this po' trash!"
But before the last words were uttered Kate

Overtaking Susan, she told her to bring the bag, and say nothing to any one who night question her, and not until they were in sight of the poor dwelling where the sick woman lay did it dawn upon Susan that it was Kate herself who was to be her companion in that solemn watch. "Law, Miss Kate! you donno what you doin'!" she said. "You mus' be plumb crazy. It's not for the likes o' you to go in sich a place ex that. You dunno what it is."

Listen to me, Susan," said Kate, stopping deliberately and facing the woman with a look of strong determination, "I know exactly what I am doing, and there's no one on earth the availingness of human aid, was a keen sweetness to poor Kate, even while her mind, in spite of her, went wandering away after her lost happiness, and drew the sharpest contrast between the dreams of bliss which she had once indulged, and this ria detectas her feet were set in. She had given up this joy she had thirsted for so long, and she felt that God had sent her this instead, and she knew it would suffice, but she knew, also, that it would be years, perhaps forever, that the memories of those unrealized dreams of delight would haunt her heart. It could not but be so, when their basis had been the one great feeling of her life, and their object her one and only here.

She had kept her sad watch in silence and loneliness a long time. Susan having gone to sleep. Oppressed by the silence of the room, Kate quickly rose and crossing the room un-heard went out into the moonlight. She stood there deep in thought when she heard sud-denly a rapid, heavy step advancing, and, look-ing up. Dr. Hale stood before her. The ex-pression of his face was stern and even angry.

"What madness has possessed you to do a thing like this!" he exclaimed. "I never heard of a more unpardonable piece of folly. Do you know and realize the fact that this woman has small-pox?"

"Perfectly," said Kate, "I knew it before I came here, and I realize entirely all the danger. No one else would come, even if any one ger. No one else would come, even it any one could have been found who had so few claims upon them as I have, and it seemed a plain and simple duty to come and take care of this friendless old woman. I have been vaccinated very recently, and I believe I am protected. I don't expect to take the disease, but if I do I had been a come, and if I had shall not regret having come; and if I had stayed away and let this poor creature suffer and die alene, I should have been miserable about it as long as I lived."

"Come inside and let me see your arm," said Dr. Hale, taking a vaccine point from his pocket as they stepped into the cabin.

When Kate had bared her arm, and turned it to him, it was not unnatural that her glance should follow his from the contemplation of the pure, clean fineness of that exquisite soft skin to that of the inflamed and festering flesh of the poor creature on the bed.

"I know," she said, softly, "it is quite possible, but I am not afraid. You expose yourself to disease continually, and why should not I?"

"It is my business and my duty," be said, "and besides, it matters little to anyone what becomes of an old your like me."

becomes of an old man like me."
"It is no more your business and duty than "It is no more your business and duty than mine in this instance, which came to my very doors," said Kate, "and there are as many to care for you as for me—indeed, a great many more, for your life is useful and valuable, while mine has been very near to worthless."

"This looks all right," said the old doctor hastily, "but I will nevertheless repeat it, by way of making sure." He made an effort to speak in a matter-of-fact way, but the honest eves behind the his gold spectacles were full of eyes behind the big gold spectacles were full of tears, the first that had been there for many a day and year. Kate felt rather than saw his emotion, as she said gently:

"I never can see why other people who expose themselves to disease are made heroes of, while the brave, good doctors are running the same risks continually and no one seems to think it worth mentioning. What I have think it worth mentioning. What I have done to-day you have done over and over again, and it will only humiliate me if you

He did not answer her, but turned instead and vented his emotion upon poor Susan. He laid the whole blame upon her shoulders, which scenned indeed stolid enough to bear it with-out injury, her chief concern being apparently to return to her interrupted slumbers. Then he went over to the bedside and carefully examined the patient, who had been all this time moaning and tossing in uneusy slumber and muttering brokenly in half-delirium.
"I don't think there's any hope for her," he suid: "she was already exhausted with the fatigue and hardships of travel, which at her nge had reduced her vitality to a low ebb. The fever is higher and the symptoms worse. You can't save her life, and you'd better come

But he knew, by the look of Kate's eyes, and the firm decision of that gentle head-shake, that he might as well not have spoken. Seeing how matters stood, he had to content himself with the assurance, which be hastened to give, that everything needful for herself ed to give, that everything needful for berself or the patient should be supplied to her, disinfectants sent immediately, her food brought, and all possible aid afforded her,

"You are very good and thoughtful," said Kate, "but indeed I don't expect anything like that. You cannot possibly undertake the office of errand boy, and I am sure no will let Susan or me go near them. I can put up with anything for such a little time, and I know it will be investible to get anything for such a little time, and I know it will be investible to get anything for will be impossible to get anyone to agree to wait on us

No, it will not," said Doctor Hale, and was able to prove his confidence not unauthorized. for that evening a means of outside communication was established, and kept up, at regular intervals. Three times a day a mes-senger came and deposited outside the garden fence a large baskes, in which not only meals for Kate and Susan were found but also medi-cines and delicacies for the patient. There were carefully arranged changes of clothing, too, and bottles of camphor and cologne and salts and everything that a tender affection and an accurate knowledge of Kate's babits could have suggested. Kate felt her heart swell with thankfulness at the manifestation of love on the part of her grandmother and Maria that all these things gave token of. One thing Doctor Hale had taken upon him-self to do, which he had not spoken of to Kate. Not content with making his protest to the girl's grandparents, who were to tell the teuth, old and incapable, he had written to Mrs. Owen, telling her what Kate had done, but assuring her at the same time that every possible care and precaution had been taken against the disease, and that, if she should, in spite of that contract it, he would telegraph to her immediately. The patient would certainly either die or become convalescent in a few days, he said, and Miss Carew should certainly lack for no care or attention that a watchful physician and an old friend could give her. He added this in the hope that Mrs. Owen would not complicate the situation by coming on herself.

CHAPTER XI

T was the third night of Kate's watch. The poor old woman, whose emuciated wrist Kate touched gently from time to time, was growing perceptibly weaker and feebler, and it seemed certain that the end had almost come. The doctor had gone away, after arranging that, in case the patient grew suddenly worse, and showed the synoptons of approach-ing death, a light should be placed in the garret window, a signal for which a servant of his own was to sit up and watch, in a house not far away. Seeing that the aged face had not far away. Seeing that the aged face had become composed into something like a fitful semblance of sleep, and that Susan was more than usually wakeful in her chair by the bed, Kate turned away, and, crossing the room, drew aside the ragged curtain and looked out into the night.

How magnificently equal Nature has been to us all, rich and poor! The sublime view of heaven and earth—of vast jeweled skies, above great undulating fields and mountains—of grand mountighted masses of cloud, hanging low over spiendid stretches of forest and river and plain—was as wonderful and beautiful seen through that crooked little window as it was from any palace in the world. The differ-ence was all within. Kate looked, enthralied, for a long moment, and then, throwing a shawl around her, stepped forth from the wretched, low-roofed room, with its sad scepe of hu-man misery, and its close, unhealthy atmosphere, into the radiant beauty of the quiet night. The great moon was high up in the Heavens, and her glory flooded all the earth. and over all a vast and solemn silence brooded. The very leaves were still upon the trees, and all human creatures seemed to lie beneath the spell of this wide stillness. She might have been the only living thing on earth for all the sense of companionship she had, as she stood there, enveloped in her large white wrap and looking no more human than if she had been an embodied shape evolved from out the moonlight. The long strain and steeplessness she had endured seemed, for the first time, to tell upon her, and she felt nervous and wenk, and, more than all, supremely, piteously, in-tolerably alone. As the dear more which rep-resented all that she could dream of blessed companionship was spoken by the still voice of her heart, although she suffered not her lips to utter it, she raised her arms, wrapped in their long white drapings and stretched them out

No wonder that the man, who with soft, but rapid steps was coming toward her, stopped abruptly, as if he had indeed seen the wraith she looked standing across his path-way. But as she dropped her arms, on seeing blin and the outlines of her figure became familiarly evident to him, he stepped forward eagerly, and caught her hands in his.

"Kate! Kate! Kate!" he said. "Is it really, really you?"

But she drew herself backward in horror, trying to wrench ber bands away, and cried out to him to run, to fly, to escape for his life. She might as well have striven with her woman's slight strength to oppose a giant, as to free herself from that gentle but compell-ion clear. ing clusp.

I have been with small-pox," she cried;

"there is danger of death in my very touch.

O, go away from me! Go away from me!"

"I know it all," he answered, and he strained her hands in a yet firmer pressure,
"It is that knowledge that has brought me to "It is that knowledge that has brought me to you. I know what you have done, and that it may cost you your life." He drew hereloser and bent his bend above her in the clear moon-light, while he whispered: "I cannot let you die, Kate, my Kate. I cannot let you be in danger of it without knowing that I have come all this way to tell you—that, whether you live or die, I love you, and will love you forever."

She could not believe it. It must be some wooderful dream, such as had come to her through many nights gone past, to be followed by such cruel waking. Yet there he stood in the calm brilliancy of the moonlight, and looked at her with eyes that nude outh to the truth of his words, and held in his her dangerous, plague-polluted hands. "O, let me go" she cried. "Don't you see, oh, don't you see I cannot bear it? Go awa from me, for your life! Mercy! have mercy Don't you see why it is I implore you? O, it is because I love you?"

Instantly her hands were loosened, but before she could stir from the spot she was clasped in his arms and strained to his heart. She could struggle no longer. She knew that, come what might, in taking her to blue he had deliberately reached forth and drawn to his breast the danger from which she would bave guarded him. But it was too late now. It had been done, and the result was with God. She was very weak and tired, and the arms that folded her so close were strong and comforting, the words her ears drank up, as thirsty ground drinks water, were sweet and satisfying. She asked no explanation of his wonderful coming, but after that brief moment of perfect rest and joy she drew herself up-right to go back to the duty which awaited her.

"I will come with you," he said, "Our place is together now, in danger or in safety. Your lonely watch is over, Kate, hereafter; it will be with me beside you.

She saw how resolute he was. And she knew it was useless to gainsay him, though the thought of contagion for him sent a cold terror to her beart very different from what she had felt about herself. How could she help trembling when she booked at that dis-figured face upon the bed, and thought that the danger of a like disfigurement threatened the danger of a tike disnigurement interference the dear face that was the very light of her eyes, and even funcied it wearing the same awful look of fast-approaching death? Her knees shook under her, but a strong arm held her up, and eyes that seemed to have in them all power and all support, looked courage into

"Be brave," a strong voice whispered. "We have done our best to use man's means against it. For the rest we have only to trust God. and whether we live or die you are mine and I am yours."

The blessed truth of these brave words brought a delicious strength to her fainting heart. She clasped the dear hand in her own, and they crossed the room together and knelt side by side by that poor bed. Susan had fallen asleep and so had falled to notice the change that had come over the patient's face, As Kate bent and looked more closely, the difficult, labored breathings confirmed her fears, and Talbot, who had laid his hand upon the withered wrist, said lowly :

"I think it is the end."

Kate called to Susan to go quickly and place the light in the window up above. She felt the thick sobs rising in her throat, for the loneliness of this sad death-bed, and again she would have broken down, in weakness, but that that are throat pound have lake bebut that that arm thrown round her held her but that that arin thrown round her held her apright. Susan, between fright and the simplifity of sleep, had taken with her the only lamp in the room, leaving them in total darkness, save for the great white sheet of mounlight that strenmed in at the open door and fell across the bed. In this uncer-tain light the sufferer opened her eyes, and at the same time spoke faintly. She seemed to be calling someone to her with a strong yearn-ing in her weak tones. Then Kate, who ing in her weak tones. Then Kate, who could not speak for tears, heard a dear, calm voice that answered her, lowly and tenderly, in the words of her native language. A feeble ery of joy escaped the dying woman's lips, and she uttered a few confused and appealing sentences, and stretched out both her hands,

"She thinks we are her son and daughter," whispered Talbot. "Give her your hand."
As Kate reached out and took one trembling enaciated hand in hers be gently took the other. The moon that looked in at the open door wrapped the three figures in a holy radiance, as Talbot bent over the bed and spoke to the bifecus, white haired figure, in the dear

the pitcous, white-baired figure, in the dear familiar toogue, of home and friends. Kate understood mething of what he said, except one word, the name of Jesus.

It was enough for that poor departing soul, for at the sound her aged face grew bright, as with a sudden glory, and with its echo in her ears she fell seleep.

The days that followed were strange and solenin ones for John Talbot and Kate Carew, for, in spite of their great happiness they were both abiding in the shadow of a possible sud-den and awful separation. It was not death that they feared so much, as the terrible thought, if one should be taken and the other left! Still jury was stronger than fear and left! Still, joy was stronger than fear, and very often they forgot possible danger in the dear delights that filled their present days.

In delivering to Kate, the morning after his arrival, Mrs. Owen's letter of repreach, entreaty and terror, Talbot explained that he had been with her aunt when the latter had received Doctor Hale's information, and had offered his services to go to Virginia to look after her niece.

"She seemed to have no suspicion of the ground of my willingness," he said, as Kate was rending the letter. "Do tell me what she

She says she hopes and trusts you will not try to see me," Kate said, and then began reading aloud: "I should never forgive myself reading around: I separate the and died, just at if he caught the infection and died, just at this present of success in his career. What on earth does she mean by that?"
"By Jove! I came near forgetting it!" exclaimed Talbot. "I ought to have told you about that. I—well—the fact is I've made my fortune. Some of my projecting has turned to account at last, and I've made an inventor tion which is worth heaps of money." He paused a moment and then added; "Do you care, Kate? I thought I cared immensely at first, and I suppose I shall again, but it doesn't seem much, one way or the other now, when so much bigger things have impensed. Still,

I hope you are glad."
"I are," said Kate. "I used to think I had too much money, but now I should like to have a great deal. I see so much to do with it."

A silence fell between them, but the same thoughts were in the hearts of each; they seemed to read that assurance in each other's eyes as their looks met. He held out his arms and she came to them in silence. He bent his face to her uplifted one, and for the second time they kissed each other.

CONCLUSION

A STORY OF FORTY GIRLS

HAS just been made into a prettily illus-trated booklet by Tax Lances Hown JOURNAL for free distribution among the girls who read the JOURNAL. It tells just what the American girl can accomplish for herself when she chooses to do so. These girls personally tell, in this little book, how it is possible for any girl, with a taste for any kind of music or singing to obtain a free musical education entirely at the expense of the Journal and without the outlay of a single penny by herself.
The girls whose pirtures are shown, and whose stories are printed in this book, have all accomplished what, especially at this time of the year, it is possible for any girl to do. The little booklet has for its title

THE BABY'S CHRISTENING

BY FRANCES E. LANIGAN

NVITATIONS to these important events should be written upon heavy dull-white cards. The fol-lowing is the accepted form: Mr. and Mrs. Gerard Lee request your presence at the christening of their infant son on Thursday, October eighth, at one o'clock.

36 Oxford Place, Cambridge.

Invite only your most intimate friends, and select the godparents from those of them who are likely to have leisure sufficient to enable them to keep the promises they are called upon to make. A boy should have two godfathers and one godmother; this order should be reversed in the case of girls.

It is always well to have the christening take place soon after the baby's birth, as the younger it is the less likely it is to be trouble-some before strangers. Try and arrange the bour so that it shall not interfere with the child's regular sleep, and do not have it brought down from the nursery until everything is in readiness. Have your drawingroom decorated simply with greens and a few dainty white flowers; clear the space in the center of the room so there shall be room for the christening party to stand before the cler-gyman, for whose use have a table covered with a fine white linen cloth, upon which should not a set less continue to the clershould rest a cut glass or silver bowl of water. The baby's nurse should wear white for the occasion, her apron bring of soft white mult, and her cap adorned with a large white satin bow. The buby's christening robe should, if possible, be made of some material, or trimmed with lace that has family or other associations. It should be made with a very short waist, and a very long skirt, and trimmed at the shoulders and either side of the waist with small white satin rosettes. Endeavor to have the baby's clothes appear soft and fluffy, not stiff and starchy, and see, above all things, that they are confortable.

When the clergyman shall have arrived, and the guests have been comfortably disposed about the drawing-room, the nurse, carrying the baby, should enter the room, followed by the parents and godparents. The party should be stand before the clergyman, who should be waiting to receive them, the baby being the center of the group. When the clergyman reaches that portion of the service in which he must take the child in his arms, the godmother should take it from the nurse and mother should take it from the nurse and hand it to him, repeating in distinct tones the name which the baby is to be given; and when it shull have been sprinkled with water, and the final prayer said, should again take it in her arms and hold it until the conclusion of the corresponding

Should you desire to have the christening take place in church, the name of the church should be indicated upon the invitations, and the christening party should stand before the clergyman in the same order; after the cere-mony the invited guests might return to the house. As soon as possible, in either case, the baby should be sent back to the nursery, after which some light refreshment, or an elaborate dinner or luncheon, should be served. The table decorations for this repost should be altogether of white, and the china used be of white and gold. The following menu, in which everything is white but the coffee, will answer for a breakfast or luncheon.

Cream of Oyster Soup

Sweetbread Patties in White Cases

Supreme de Volaille Potato Balls, Cream Sauce Cauliflower, White Dressing

Celery Salad, White Mayonnaise Dressing Neuchatel Cheese Wafers

when word came that El-nathan Allen, Esquire, of Menlo Park, Cali-fornia, wuz a comin' to Jonesville to visit his old friends.

That man had begun life poor, poor as a suipe—sometimes I used to handle that very word "suipe" a describin' Elnathan Allen's former circumstances to Josiah, when he got too overbearin' about him, for a woman can't stand only jest about so much agrivatin' and treadin' on before she will turn like a worm. That is Bible, about the worm, and must be believed.

What used to mad me worst waz when be would get to comparin' Rhathan with one of 'em on my side who was shiftless. Good land! 'Zekiel Smith hain't the only man on earth who is ornary and no account. Every partner has 'em, more or less, on his side and on bern; let not one pardner boost themselves over the other one-both have their draw-

He had gone fur west, got rich, invested his capital first rate—some on it in a big eastern city—and had got to be a millionaire.

He was a widower with one child, the Little Maid, as he called her. He jest idolized her, and thought she wax perfect.

And I spoze she wax oncommon, not from what her Pa said; no, I didn't take all his talk about her for Gospel, I knew too much. But Barzelia Ann Allen (a old maid up to date) had seen her; had been out to California on a exension train and stayed some time

And she said she was the sweetest child this side of Heaven, with eyes of violet blue, big luminous eyes that drew the bearts and souls of folks right out of their bodies, when they looked into 'em, so full of radiant joy and heavenly sweetness waz they.

And hair of waving gold, and lips and checks as pink as the hearts of the roses that clambered all winter round her winder, and the sweetest, daintiest ways, and so good to everybody, them that wux poor and sufferin' most of all.

Barzeel wuz always most too enthusiastic to soit me. But I got the idee from what she said that she wux a oncommon lovely child, Good land? Elnathan couldn't talk 'bo nnything else. Like little babblin' brooks runnin' towards the sea, all his talk, every nnecdote he told, and every idee he set forth, jest led up to and ended with that child, jest

And he himself told me so many stories about her bein' so good to the poor, and sacri-ficin' her little comforts for 'em, at her age, too, that I thought to myself. I wonder why you don't take some of them object lessons to heart, why you don't sit down at her feet and learn of her, and I wondered, too, where she took her sweet charity from, but spozed it wuz from her mother—her mother had been a beautiful woman, so I had been told. She wuz a Deverenux—nobody that I ever knew, nor Josiah—Celeste Deverenux.

The little girl wux named for her mother, but they always called her the Little Maid.

Wall, to resoom, and to hitch the horse in front of the wagin agin (allegory). Elnathan had left the Little Maid and her norse in that eastern city where he owned to much property, and had come on to pay a flyin' visit to Jonesville, not forgettin' Loontown, you may be sure, where a deceased munt had jest died and left her property to him.

He waz close,

And then I says: "How is anybody a goin' to live pattern lives when they are starvin' to death? And how is anybody a goin' to enjoy religion when they are a chokin'?"

And then he threw some more statisticks at me, dry and hard ones, too, and agin he see they didn't bit me, and then he kinder laughed agin and assumed somethin' of a jokeular air -such as men will when they are talkin' to wimmin, dretful exasperatin', too—and sez he: "You are a philosopher, Cousin Samantha. And you must know such houses as you are and you must know such houses as you are a talkin' about are advantageous in one way, if in no other. They help to reduce the surplus population. If it wuzn't for such places, and for the electric wires, and bomb cranks, and accidents, etc., the world would get too full to stand up in."

"Help to reduce the surplus population:" sez 1, and my voice shook with indignation as I said it. Sez 1:

But the way up to them led over a crazy pair of stairs, so broken and rotten that even the agent waz disgusted with 'em and had wrote a letter to Elmothon asking for new stairs and new sanitary arrangements as the deaths wuz so frequent in that pertikular tenement that the agent was frightened for fear they would be complained of by the city fathers—though them old fathers can stand a good deal without complainin'.

Wall, the agent wrote, but Einsthan waz at that time building a new orchid house (he had more'n a dozen on 'em before) for the Little Maid; she loved these half-human blossoms.

And he waz buildin' a high palm house, and a new fountain, and a veranda covered with curved lattice work around the Little Maid's apartments, and a stained-glass gallery leading from the conservatory to the green-houses and these other houses I have mentioned, so the Little Maid could walk out to 'em on too sunny days, or when it misted some.

And so he wrote back to his agent that he couldn't possibly spend any money on stairs or plumbing in a tenament house, for the repairs he waz making on his own place at Menlo Park would cost over a hundred thousand dollars, and he felt that he couldn't fix them stairs, and he thought, anyway, that it waza't hest to listen to the complaints of complaints' tenants—and he ended in that jokeular plainin' tenants-and he ended in that jokenlar told me about - where Squalor, and Crime, and Disease, and Death walked hand in hand, gathering new victims at every step, and where the children waz a droppin' down in the poisonous air like dead leaves in a swamp.

I kep' a thinkin' of this, and finally I tackled.

The business of settlin' the estate took quite a while, but he didn't worry any; he said the nurse wuz good as gold; she would take good care of the Little Maid; she wrote to him every day—and so she did, the hassy, all through that dretful time to come. Ob dear me! oh dear sux! The nurse Jean had a sister who had come over from England with a cargo of troubles and children after Jean had gone on to Cali-

And Elnathan, good-natured when he wus a mind to, he had listened to Jean's story of her sister's woes, with poverty, hungry chil-dren and a drunken husband, and had given this sister two small rooms in one of his bene-ment houses and asked so little for them that they wuz livin' quite comfortable, if anybody could live comfortable in such a nasty spot. Their rooms wuz on top of the house, and wuz kept clean, and so high up that they build wholesome ones, and in place of the worst ones, to help make some little open breathin' places for the poor creeters down there, with a green tree or some flowers, or grass now and then.

The Little Maid enjoyed it all, and Eluathan enjoyed it twice over, once and first in her, and then, of course, in his own self. But the Little Maid looked sort o' pimpin', and her little appetite didn't seem to be very good, and the doctor said that a journey cost would do her good.

And jest at this time the dowry in Loontown

Elnathan had forgot all about Jean havin' any relations in the big eastern city where they stopped first. Good land! Their little idees and images had got all overlaid, and covered up with glass angels, orchids, bank stock, some mines, palm houses, political yearnin's, social destructions, carved lattice work, some religious idees, and yots and club houses, etc.,

But when he decided to leave the Little Maid in the city, and not ben't he be Described (and I believe my soul, and I always shall believe it, that he wuz in doubt whether we had things good enough for her. The idee! He said he thought it would be too much for her to go round to all the relations—wall, mebby it was that! But I shall always have my thoughts).

But, anyway, when he made up his mind to leave her, he give the nurse strict orders to not go down into the city below a certain street, which wuz a good high one, and not let the Little Maid out of her sight night or day.

Wall, the nurse knew it wuz wrong, she knew it, but she did it jest as Cain did, and jest as David did when he killed Ury, and jest as David did when he killed Ury, and I blaze, and you and I. Joseph's brothers, and Pharo, and you and I, and the relations on his side, and on yourn.

She knew she hadn't ort to. But bein' out a walkin' with the Little Maid one day, a homesick feelin' come over her all of a sudden. She wanted to see her sister, wanted to

den. She wanted to see her sister, wanted to like a dog.
So, as the day wuz very fair, she thought mebby it wouldn't do any hur:
The sky wuz so blue between the green boughs of the park. There had been a rain, and the glistenin' green made her think of the hedge rows of old England, where she and Kate used to find birds' nests, and the blue wuz jest the shade of the sweet old English violets. How she and Katy used to love them, And the blue, too, wuz jest the color of Katy's eyes when she last see 'em full of tears at partin' from her.

eyes when she last see 'em full of tears at partin' from her.

She thought of Elnathan's sharp orders not to go down into the city, and not to let the Little Maid out of her sight.

Wall, she thought it over, and thought that mebby if she kept one of her promises good she would be forgive the other.

Jest as the Israelites did about the manny, and jest as you did when you told your wite you would bring her home a present and come home early—and you hore her home a brace-you would uring her home a present and come thome early—and you have her home a brace-let—at four o'clock in the mornin'.

And jest as I did when I said under the in-fluence of a stirrin' sermon, that I wouldn't forget it, and I would live up to it. Wall, I hain't forgot it!

But, tempyrate, the upshot of the matter waz that the nurse thought she would keep half of her master's orders; she wouldn't let the Little Maid out of her sight.

So she hired a cab—she had plenty of money. Elnathan didn't stent her on wages. He had his good qualities, Elnathan had,
And she and the Little Maid relied areas.

And she and the Little Maid rolled away, down through the broad, beautiful streets, lined with stately houses and filled with a throng of gay, handsome, elegantly-clothed men, women and children—down into narrower business streets, with lofty warehouses on each side, and full of a well-dressed hurrying crowd of business nien-down-down-down into the dreadful street she had set out

THE ORIGIN OF THE "BROWNIES"

By Palmer Cox

DURING the publication of the series of the "Brownies" the series of the "Brownies" just closed in The Ladars' Home Journal, the question has often come to me "What is the origin of the "Brownies?" And perhaps there is no better time to answer this question than now, before the next series of "Brownie" adventures shall begin on this page.
The "Brownie," as the evelopædia informs us, springs from an old Scotch tradition, but it leaves us to follow up the malition ourselves and learn how far back into the past it may be traced. Now a tradition, into the past it may be traced. Now a tradition, or legend, is about as difficult game to hunt or legend, is about as difficult game to bunt to cover as your literary fowler can flush, but enough can be found to prove that the "Brownies" were good-natured little spirits or goblins of the fairy order. They were all lit-tle men, and appeared only at night to perform, good and helpful deeds or enjoy harmless pranks while weary bouseholds slept, never allowing themselves to be seen by mortals. No person, except those gifted with second sight, could see the "Brownies;" but from the privileged few, principally old women, who were thus enabled to now and then catch a glimpse of their goblin guests, correct inforglimpse of their goblin guests, correct infor-mation regarding their size and color is said to have been gained.

THEY were called "Brownies" on account I of their color, which was said to be brown owing to their constant exposure to all brown owing to their constant exposure to all kinds of weather, and also because they had brown hair, something which was not com-mon in the country where the "Brownie" was located, as the people generally had red or black hair. There are different stories about the origin of the name. One is that during the time the Covenanters in Scotland were persecuted because they were said to teach a false and pernicious doctrine, many of them were forced to conceal themselves in caves and secret places, and food was carried to them by secret places, and food was carried to them by friends. One band of Covenanters was led by friends. One band of Covenanters was led by a little hunchback named Brown, who being small and active could slip out at night with some of the lads and bring in the provisions left by friends in secret places. They dressed themselves in a fantastic manner, and if seen in the dusk of the evening they would be taken for fairies. Those who knew the truth named Brown and his band the "Brownies." This is very plausible, but we have too high an opinion of the "Brownies" to believe that they took their name from a mortal. We are inclined to believe that the well-deserving hunchback took his name from the "Brown-ies," Instead of the "Brownies" deriving their name from him. Besides, the story does not reach back far enough.

THE "Brownies" were an ancient and wellorganized band long before there was a Covenanter to flee to caves and caverns. Indeed, from what can be gathered from the writings of ancient authors, one is led to believe the "Brownie" idea is a very old one,
It is fair to presume that the "Brownies" enjoyed their nightly pranks, or skipped over the dewy heather to aid deserving peasants even before the red-haired Dane crossed the border to be Caledonia's unwelcome guest.
Every family seems to have been hunnied by Every family seems to have been haunted by a spirit they called "Brownie" which did dif-ferent sorts of work, and they in return gave him offerings of the various products of the place. The "Brownie," idea was woven into place. The "Brownic," idea was woven into the affairs of everyday life. In fact, it seemed to be part of their religion, and a large part at that. When they churned their milk, or brewed, they poured some milk or wort through the hole in a flat, thin stone called "Brownie's stone." In other cases they poured the offering in the corners of the room, believing that good would surely come to their homes if "the Brownies" were remembered, On out of the way islands, where the people could neither read nor write and were wholly ignorant of what was going on in other parts of the country, so much so that they looked upon a person that could understand black marks on paper as a supernatural being, the "Brownie" was regarded as their helper.

The poet Milton had doubtless one of these "Brownies" in his mind when he penned the lines in "L'Allegro" to the "lubber fiend," who drudged and sweat

"To earn his cream-bowl duty sat,"

But, strange to say, he was not as com-plimentary as the untarnished reputation plinentary as the untarnished reputation of the "Brownies" might lead one to expect. In some villages, near their chapel, they had a large flat stone called "Brownie's stone," upon which the ancient inhabitants offered a cow's milk every Sunday to secure the good-will of the "Brownies." That the "Brownies" were good enters, and could out-do the cast in their love for grounds is well recovering. cat in their love for cream, is well proven I'may be gratifying to some to know that even kings have not thought it beneath their dignity to dip the royal pen in the "Brownies'" behalf. King James in his "Decemonology" says: "The spirit called 'Brownie' appeared like a man and haunted divers houses without doing any evil, but doing as it houses without doing any evil, but doing as it were necessarie turnes up and down the house, yet some were so blinded as to believe that their house was all the sonsier, as they called it, that such spirits resorted there." Other writers say that the "Brownie" was a sturdy fairy, who, if he was fed well and treated kindly would do, as the people said, a great deal of work. He is said to have been obliging, and used to come into houses by night, and for a dish of cream perform lustily any piece of work that might remain to be done.

The superstitious inhabitants had absolute work that might remain to be done.

The superstitious inhabitants had absolute faith in the "Brownies" wisdom or judgment. The "Brownie" spirit was said to reach over the table and make a mark where his favorite was to sit at a game if he wished to win, and this "tip" from the "Brownie" was never disregarded by the player.

THE seeker after facts concerning the origin of the "Brownies" will find it difficult to gather them in. He may visit the largest libraries in the land and turn the leaves of old volumes that have been neglected for centuries, and fail to find more than that at one time in the long long ago, the "Brownie" was a power in the land that no well-regulated family could afford to do without. One thing is cortain, however, the more we learn about the family could afford to do without. One thing is certain, bowever, the more we learn about the "Brownies" the better we like them. Theirs is a genealogy that one can trace back through the dusty centuries of the past without finding one blot on their scutcheon, or discovering that they descended from a race of robbers or evil doers. It is indeed refreshing to learn that at a time when the age was so dark that even Christianity could scarcely send a ray of light through it, and when every man's hand seemed to be against his brother, when poachers, moss-troopers and plundering men of might were decuding the land, the "Brownies" through rain and shine were found at their post every night, siding the distressed, picking up the work that weary hands let fall, and in many ways winning the love and respect of the people.

THE BROWNIES IN THE JOURNAL

THEY ARE PREPARING FOR A JOURNEY ROUND THE WORLD

FOR some time past the famous band of "Brownies" have been laying plans for a journey around the world, and next month THE LADIES HOME JOUR-

NAL hopes to print in its pages the first of their series of adventures in the different countries of Europe.
This series by these funny little men will undoubtedly be the most notable in which they have ever figured, and their adventures in strange countries will be as varied as they in strange countries will be as varied as they will be exciting. The series will be known as:

THE BROWNIES ROUND THE WORLD and for it Mr. Cox has made some of the most striking and humorous pictures which have

The little men will visit all the countries represented by the band, and the picture at the head of this page shows some of them in readiness for the start. The tour will begin in Canada and end in the Polar Regions clear to the North Pole. The band will go to Eng-land, Ireland and Saotland, Italy, France, Germany, Switzerland, Holland, Russia, China and the land of the Esquimanx. They will have sport and adventure in these countries as only the "Brownies" can have, and they will send home to their thousands of friends each month, a careful account of their doings while far away from home.

My Father As I Recall Him

IN FIVE PAPERS

F, in these reminiscent papers of my father, which I have been led to write by the Editor of THE LADGE' HOME JOURNAL, I should tell you, my does American friends my dear American friends, nothing new of him, I can, at least, promise you that what I shall tell will be told faithfully, if simply, and perhaps there may be some things not familiar to you.

A great many writers have taken it upon themselves to write lives of my father, to tell anecdotes of him, and to print all manner of things about him. Of all these published books I have read but one, the only genuine "life" thus far written of him, the one sanctioned by my father himself, namely: "The Life of Charles Dickens," by John Forster.

But in these papers I shall depend chiefly upon my own memory of him, for I wish no other or dearer remembrance. My love for my father has never been touched or approached by any other love. I hold him in my heart of hearts as a man apart from all other men, as one apart from all other beings.

SEFING = GAD'S BULL" AS A CHILD.

SEEING "GAD'S HILL" AS A CHILD

OF my father's childhood it is but natural that I should know very little more than the knowledge possessed by the great public. But I never remember hearing him allude at any time, or under any circumstances, to those unhappy days in his life except in the one instance of his childish love and admiration for "Gad's Hill," which was destined to become so closely associated with his name and works.

and admiration for "Gad's Hill," which was destined to become so closely associated with his name and works.

He had a very strong and faithful attachment for places, Chatham, I think, being his first love in this respect. For it was here, when a child, and a very sickly child, poor little fellow, that he found in an old spare room a store of books, among which were "Roderick Random," "Peregrine Pickle," "Humphrey Clinker," "Tom Jones," "The Vlear of Wakefeld," "Don Quixote," "Gil Blas," "Robinson Crusoe," "The Arabian Nights" and other volumes. "They were," as Mr. Forster wrote, "a host of friends when he had no single friend." And it was while living at Chatham, that he first saw "Gad's Hill."

As a "very queer small boy "he used to walk up to the honse—it stood on the summit of a high hill—on holidays, or when his heart ached for "a great treat." He would stand and look at it, for as a little fellow he had a wonderful liking and admiration for the house, and it was, to him, like no other house he had ever seen. He would walk up and down before it with his father, gazing at it with delight, and the latter would tell him that perhaps if he worked hard, was industrious, and grew up to be a good man, he might some day come to live in that very house. His love for this if he worked hard, was industrious, and grew up to be a good man, he might some day come to live in that very house. His love for this place went through his whole life, and was with him until his death. He takes "Mr. Pickwick" and his friends from Rochester to Cobham by the beautiful back road, and I remember one day when we were driving that way he showed me the exact spot where Mr. Winkle" called out: "Whos, I have dropped my whip!" After his marriage he took his wife for the honeymoon to a village called Chalk, between Gravesend and Rochester.

Many years after, when he was living with Chalk, between Gravesend and Rochester.

Many years after, when he was living with his family in a villa near Lausanne, he wrote to a friend: "The green woods and green shades about here are more like Cobham, in Kent, than anything we dream of at the foot of the Alpine passes." And again, in still later years, one of his favorite walks from "Gad's Hill" was to a village called Shorne, where there was a quaint old church and grave-yard. He often said that he would like to be buried there the reare and quiet of the homely buried there, the pence and quiet of the homely little place having a tender fascination for him, So we see that his heart was always in Kent,

BUT let this single reference of his earlier D years suffice, so that I may write of him during those years when I remember him among us and around us in the home.

From his earliest childhood, throughout his earliest married life to the day of his death, his nature was home-loving. He was a earliest married life to the day of his death, his nature was home-loving. He was a "home man" in every respect. When he became celebrated at a very early age, as we know, all his joys and sorrows were taken home; and he found there sympathy and the companiouship of his "own familiar friends." In his letters to these latter, in his letters to my mother, to my aunt, and, later on, to us his children, he never forgot anything that he knew would be of interest about his work, his successes, his hopes or fears. And there was a sweet simplicity in his belief that such news would most certainly be acceptable to all, that is wonderfully touching and childlike coming from a man of genius.

His care and thoughtfulness about home matters, nothing being doesned too small or trivial to claim his attention and consideration, were really maryelous when we remember his action and consideration. were really marvelous when we remember his active, eager, restless, working brain. No man was so inclined naturally to derive his happiness from home affairs. He was full of the kind of interest in a house which is com-monly confined to the women. And his care of and for us as wee children did most cer-tainly "pass the love of women!" His was a tainly "pass the love of women!" tender and most affectionate nature.

HIS LOVE OF CHILDREN

HIS LOVE OF CHILDREN

TOR many consecutive summers we used to be taken to a little watering place called Broadstairs. This little place became a great favorite with my father. He was always very happy there, and delighted in wandering about the gardens, generally with his youngest child, "the noble Plorn," in his arms, or trotting by his side. These two were constant companions in those days, and after these walks my father would always have some funny anecdote to tell us. And when years later the time came for the boy of his heart to go out into the world, my father, after seeing him off, wrote: "Poor Plorn has gone to Australia. It was a hard parting at the last. He seemed to become once more my youngest and favorite little child as the day drew near, and I did not think I could have been so shaken. These are hard, hard things, but they might have to be done without means or influence, and then they would be far harder. God bless him!"

When my father was arranging and rehearsing his readings from "Dombey," the death of "little Paul" caused him such real angulah, the reading being so difficult to him, that he told us he could only master his intense emotion by keeping the picture of Plorn, world, a more thoroughly tidy or me-thodical creature than was my father. He was tidy in every way—in his great, generous and noble mind, in his handsome and grace-and noble mind, in his handsome and graceful person, in his work, in keeping his writing table drawers, in his large correspondence, in fact in his whole life.

I remember that my sister and I occupied a little garret room in Devoushire Terrace, at the very top of the house. He had taken the greatest pains and care to make the room as pretty and comfortable for his two little daughters as it could be made. He was often dragged up the steep staircase to this room to see some new print or some new ornament which we children had put up, and he always gave us words of pulse and approval. He encouraged us in every possible way to make ourselves useful, and to adorn and beantify our rooms with our own hands, and to be make ourselves useful, and to adorn and beau-tify our rooms with our own bands, and to be ever tidy and neat. I remember that the adornment of this garret was decidedly primi-tive, the unframed prints being fastened to the wall by ordinary white or black pins, whichever we could get. But, never mind, if they were put up neatly and tidily they were always "excellent," or "quite slap-up" as he used to say. Even in those early days, he made a point of visiting every room in the bouse once each morning, and if a chair was out of its place, or a blind not quite straight, or a crumb left on the floor, woe betide the offender.

And then his punctuality! It was almost frightful to an unpunctual mind! This again was another phase of his extreme tidiness; it was also the outcome of his excessive thoughtfulness and consideration for others. His sympathy, also, with all pain and suffering made him quite invaluable in a sick room. Quick, active, sensible, bright and cheery, and sympathetic to a degree, he would seize the "case" at once, know exactly what to do and

In the "Gad's Hill" days, when the house was full of visitors, he had a peculiar notion of always having the menu for the day's dinner placed on the sideboard at luncheon time. And then he would discuss every item in his fanciful, humorous way with his guests, much to this effect; "Cock-a-leekie? Good, decidedly good; fried soles with shrimp sauce? Good again; croquettes of chicken? Weak very weak; decided want of imagination here," and so on, and he would apparently be so taken up with the merits or demerits of a menu that one might imagine he lived for nothing but the coming dinner. He had a small but healthy appetite, but was remarkably abstemious both in eating and drinking. He was delightful as a bost, caring individually for each guest, and bringing the special qualities of each into full notice and prominence, putting the very shyest at his or her case, making the best of the most humdrum, and never thrusting himself forward.

But when he was most delightful was alone with us at home and sitting over dessert, and very weak; decided want of imagination here,"

But when he was most delightful was alone with us at home and sitting over dessert, and when my sister was with us especially—I am talking now of our grown-up days—for she had great power in "drawing him out." At such imes they would discuss mesmerism and other magnetic subjects. One illustration I remember his using was, that meeting some one in the busy London streets he was on the point of turning back to accost the supposed friend when finding out his mistake in time he walked on again until he actually met the real friend, whose shadow, as it were, but a moment ago had come across his path. And then the forgetting of a word or a name. "Now into what pigeon-hole of my brain did that go, and why do I suddenly remember it now?" And as these thoughts passed through his mind and were spoken softly and dreamily, so they also appeared in softly and dreamily, so they also appeared in his face. Another instant, perhaps, and his eyes would be full of fun and laughter.

THE ORIGINAL OF "LITTLE NELL"

A T the beginning of his literary career be suffered a great sorrow in the death—a very sudden death—of my mother's sister. Mary Hogarth. She was of a most charming and lovable disposition, as well as being personally very beautiful. Soor after my parents married, Aunt Mary was constantly with them. As her nature developed she became my father's ideal of what a young girl should be. And his own words show how this great affection and the influence of the girl's loved memory were with him to the end of his life. The shock of her sudden death so affected and prostrated him that the publication of "Pickwick" was interrupted for two months. "I look back," he wrote, "and with uningled pleasure, to every link which each ensuing week has added to the chain of our attachment. It shall go hard I hope ere anything but death impairs the toughness of a bond now so firmly riveted. That becautiful passage you were so kind and considerate as to send to me has given me the only feeling akin to pleasure, sorrowful pleasure it is, that I have yet had connected with the loss of my and her grave bears the following inscription, written by my father:

"Young, beautiful and good, God in His mercy numbered her among His angels at the early age of seventeen."

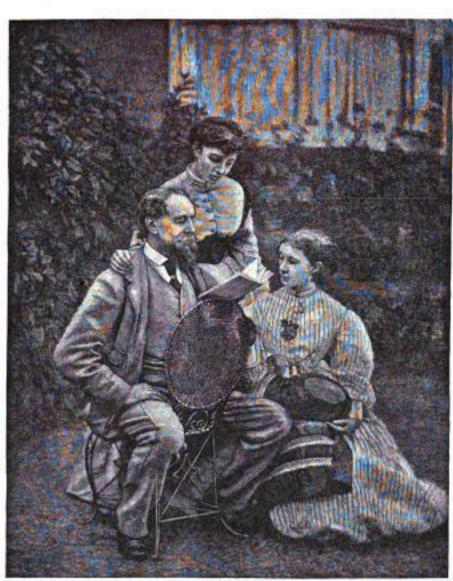

There is no doubt that in "Little Nell" much of Aunt Mary's character is reproduced.

A year after her death, in writing to my mother from Yorkshire, he says: "Is it not extraordinary that the same dearms, which extraordinary that the same dreams which have constantly visited me since poor Mary died follow me everywhere? After all the change of scene and fatigue I have dreamt of her ever since I left home, and no doubt shall until I return. I would fain believe, sometimes, that her spirit may have some influence over them but their perpendicular execution is over them, but their perpetual repetition is extraordinary."

N the course of years there came changes in A our home, inevitable changes. But no changes could ever alter my father's homeloving nature. As he wrote to Mr. Forster, as a young man, so it was with him to the time of his death: "We shall soon meet, please God, and be happier than ever we were in all our lives. Oh! home-home-home!!!

well, strong and hearty, steadily before his eyes. We can see by the different child characters in his books what a wonderful knowledge he had of children, and what a wonderful and truly womanly sympathy he had with them in all their childish joys and griefs. I can remember with us, his own children, how kind, considerate and patient he always was. But we were never afraid to go to him in any trouble, and never had a snub from him or a cross word under any circumstances. He or a cross word under any circumstances, was always glad to give us "treats," as was always glad to give us "treats," as he called them, and used to conceive all manner of those "treats" for us, and if any favor had to be asked we were always sure of a favorable answer. On these occasions my sister "Katle" was generally our messenger, we others waiting outside the study door to hear the verdict. She and I used to have delightful treats in those summer evenings, driving up to Hammelead in the over correspondent. driving up to Hampstead in the open carriage with him, our mother and "Auntle," and getting out for a long walk through the lovely country lanes, picking wild roses and other flowers, or walking hand and band with him listening to some story.

*When I write about my aunt or "Auntie," me so doubt I may often have occasion to do, it is of the aunt par excellence, deorgina Hogarith. She has been to me ever since I can remember anything, and to all of us, the truest, best and dearest friend, companion and com-selor. To quote my father's own words: "The best and truest friend man ever had."

do it. In all our childish ailments his visits were eagerly looked forward to; and our little hearts would beat a shade faster, and our aches and pains become more bearable, when the sound of his quick footstep was heard, and the encouraging accents of his voice greeted the invalid. I can remember now, as if it were yesterday, how the touch of his hand—he had a most sympathetic touch—was almost too much sometimes, the help and hope in it mak-ing my heart full to overflowing. He believed firmly in the power of mesmerism, and was always deeply interested in this subject. I know of many cases, myself among the num-ber, where his power in this was used with perfect success.

And however busy he might be, and even And however busy he might be, and even in his hours of relaxation, he was still, if you can understand me, always busy; he would give up any amount of time and spare himself no fatigue if he could in any way alleviate sickness and pain.

AT THE TABLE AND AS HOST

I N very many of my father's books there are A frequent references to delicious meals, wonderful dinners and more marvelous dishes, steaming bowls of punch, etc., which have bed many to believe that he was a man very find of the table. And yet I think no more ab-stemious man ever lived.

HE girl who possesses a singing voice is doubly blessed. She cannot only amuse herself, but she can do much to make others happy. Never be-fore has vocal culture been brought to the high standard it now occupies. It can no longer be said that American girls are not good singers. I have known many talented women in America who not only possessed fine natural voices, but who by careful study had cultivated them so thoroughly that they might do any kind of lyric, operatic, and church might do any kind of lyric, operatic, and church singing quite as well as some of the foreign-born artists. For myself, I have always had great fondness for American girls; I like their characters; I love their independent natures; I admire the way they go about their work. It seems to me that nothing is impossible with them. During the past ten years they have outgrown what might properly be called provincialism. They are now in touch with all the world. They are ns well educated as the girls of any other nation. They dress as well and as becomingly as the women of any of the gay European capitals. They have made marrelous progress in every field of labor they have invaded. They have done well, and will do still better, for their tircless industry, their patient plodding and inexbaustible courage and firmness of determination must in the end conquer every obstacle.

BUT it is of the American girl as a singer that I desire to speak. During my trav-els in America I made the acquaintance of a great many young women who possessed fair voices and were ambitious to earn their living voices and were ambitious to earn their living on the stage in opera or in concert. Looking back over my own career I would like to give a few hints to those who think of embarking in a work that brings many trials, but also rewards and honors, rich and thick. The first thing for a girl to do is to find out if she has a voice. This cannot possibly be ascertained until she is fifteen or sixteen years of age. If the possesses a voice, and is ambitious to go on the stage, she should at once put herself in the care of a teacher who knows how to develop the roice without straining it. I have known so many girls who were fitted by nature with good voices, and who might have become famous if they had only begun right, but through carelessness when they were young their voices were strained, and before they were twenty years of age were cracked and metallic-like. There was no melody in them, and yet a practiced ear could now and then metallic-like. There was no melody in them, and yet a practiced ear could now and then detect a note or two of such sweetness as to attest the fact that if they had been properly trained, their voices would have been grand and beautiful. Let me advise you, girls—and this advice is equally good for mothers and teachers—be careful how you begin. Under no circumstances use your voice when you ought not to. Above all things, do not strain too much; do not be in a burry to take the highest notes. Be patient, persevering, study hard, and you will find it is not so difficult when once you have begun properly to end when once you have begun properly to end your studies by singing all notes with grace, precision and sweetness.

I AM often asked at what are should a girl begin to cultivate her voice, and I have received bundreds of letters from all over the world asking the same question. As I said before, I think the proper time is at about fifteen or sixteen. Then the voice is fresh, and it can be trained as it should be. It is a misit can be trained as it should be. It is a mis-take for girls to try to sing earlier than the ages I have indicated. The practice each day depends largely upon the voice. I have a theory that an hour a day is quite sufficient. I do not mean by this that a girl should sing for an hour at a time; that would be a fatal mistake. Divide the hour into quarters, or even shorter periods than that, and let it extend over the entire day. This gives the voice a chance to rest and to grow. There is nothing more harmful for a young voice than too much practice. Your teacher will tell you, not dear more harming for a young voice than too mines practice. Your teacher will tell you, my dear girls, the sort of music you should begin with. In a measure it depends upon the voice, its strength and previous instruction. In the main, however, I prefer simple music for beginners and then gradually to advance by singing more difficult pieces. But do not be in a hurry. I cannot impress upon you too much the necessity of gnarding your voice while it is still young and fresh. No matter how sweet and strong your second code, son how sweet and strong your vocal cords, you how sweet and strong your vocal cords, you cannot expect to harry things along in rail-way-train fashion. My advice to you is, he slow; he careful; do not hurry.

It takes from three to four years to properly cultivate the voice; it cannot be done in less than three years, and it may require even more time. After the first year of preliminary study a student will be given more difficult tasks to perform. And it is at this point in their career that I would urge upon them the necessity for taking up another study—that is, if they intend to follow the study—singers is that they have never received any instruction in acting, and so when they appear instruction in arting and so when they appear upon the stage they are stiff, stilted, awkward and painful to helold. Their voices may be never so good, but if they do not know how to more about gracefully, to gesticulate when occasion requires it, and to get up and sit down in a natural, easy manner, they make a pain-ful impression upon the audience. We all have seen good singers upon the stage who did have seen good singers upon the stage who did not know what to do with their hands or feet. These useful parts of the body seem to be con-stantly in their way. I would remedy this by the teaching of acting with that of singing, for if the singer intends to go on the operatic stage, she will find the culture in dramstics that she will have received, of incalculable benefit to her. Singing and acting go hand in hand; they are inseparable. Many a poor singer is very much helped by being a good actress, but if one is a good singer and a good actress at the same time, her chances of success are doubly good. And while upon the subject of acting I should like to say how important it is for the students to read and become famil-far with literature and all the best writers and poets.

HOW to preserve one's voice is a serious problem, and one that I am often asked to elucidate. I should first of all recommend care from colds or drafts; a singer cannot be too careful about going out into the open air. Another important thing is rest. When I am to sing at night I dine at four o'clock; I have soup, fish and steak, perhaps, but no sweets or entries. I never drink anything except for medicinal purposes, unless I am not to sing for some time. When I do drink, however, it is whiskey and seltzer, and this solely upon the recommendation of my doctor. I believe whiskey and seltzer to be better than claret and water for a singer, if one must drink something. Wine is very bad for the voice, and I would like to be emphatic in urging my readers to abstain from it. I have known a great many good voices to be ruined by drinking wine. After my dinner, which is enten very leisurely, I sit down in a big chair and close my eyes. Sometimes I sleep and sometimes I do not, but the rest that comes from such perfect repose is very gratifying. With plenty of sleep, rest, and the proper diet, a close my eyes. Sometimes I sleep and sometimes I do not, but the rest that comes from such perfect repose is very gratifying. With plenty of sleep, rest, and the proper diet, a good voice should be preserved until a woman becomes very old. I would strongly urge the eating of plain food. Finids taken in any quantity are harmful. Milk may be drunk, but it is more ensily digested when mixed with soda water. Pastry, nuts, almonds and raisins, pickles, sauces and other condiments are simply poison to a singer. With these and stimulants, the velvety and sympathetic qualities of the voice are really destroyed, or made bard and metallic. Everything indigestible should be avoided, and every care taken to eat regularly. After the performance of the opera I am always hungry and eat twice as much for my supper as I do for my dinner, and yet I have not a great appetite. I remember on one occasion I was on a concert tour with the great Titiens, Madame Trebelli and two others with us. We were all ravenous after the performance and went to the hotel for supper. Madame Titiens reached there before us and we found her finishing the supper—one chicken that the innocent hotel proprietor imagined was enough for all five. there before us and we found ber finishing the supper—one chicken that the innocent hotel proprietor imagined was enough for all five. Mutton or beef broiled or boiled are the best ments to eat, while all fish, game and vegetables are good. Light, farinaceous puddings are wholesome, but greasy soups should be avoided. Fresh and ripe fruit is excellent, and a pound of good grapes daily is the finest possible tonic for the vocal cords. So much for the question of what a singer should est.

T there are other things to be considered. On rising, the chest, neck, throat and back of the neck should be sponged rapidly and then briskly dried. Young ladies need not be afraid of using plenty of pure, unscented soap. It will not hurt their complexions. The throat should be gargled with salt and water. As the teach wise warm and water. and water. As the teeth play a very impor-tant part in the production of the voice, as well as in the facial expression of the singer, they should be scrupulously attended to and washed after every meal with tegid water and a hard brush. The bath should be taken on retiring to bed at night, and the water should be tepid. From three to five minutes is quite long enough to remain in the water. As to the question of exercise, I should say that too much of it is very dangerous for a singer. Any exercise that is violent should be avoided. So should too, much walking. And it is a great mistake to try to sing when the body is fatigued.

THERE is another point that I should like 1 to impress upon the American girl, and that is the necessity of sequiring the habit of breathing through the ness when walking, especially when the weather is damp. This has a double advantage, as it keeps the air from the throat and gives the singer a long breath. Singers should also learn to sleep at night with the mouth closed; sleeping with the mouth open causes bonrscness. It is related of Gresi that she wore an elastic band over her head and chin at night, in order to keep ber mouth closed.

What else can I say? The subject is a vast one. I have tried to lay down a few simple rules for the guidance of my young American friends. It is a difficult task. There is no subject on which opinions are so divided, or where prejudices are so strong as the proper course to be pursued for the development and training of the voice. For my own part I find I have much to learn. The girl whose voice is trained when she is twenty years of age has just begun her life work. She will find that if she would succeed she must study and work, work and study without ceasing. It is the penalty of success. There is no royal road that may be success. There is no royal road that may be traveled. No lyric artist can be said to have completed her studies until she has retired completed her studies until she has retired from the stage. I know great singers, well, famous singers, who re-study their parts and their music two or three times a week to see if they cannot still further perfect their read-ing and execution. I have known some of these singers to practice a simple English bailed over twenty times before they would venture to sing it in public.

EMMA THURSBY'S FIRST SONG

BY DAVID B. GULICK

HE lather of the famous singer was John B. Thursby who, with his brother, Rodney, carried on an extensive rope-walk and cordwainage ney, carried on an extensive rope-walk and cordwninage business in Brooklyn. The family lived on Grand Street, Williamsburgh—the Eastern District, Brooklyn. We were neighbors, and the Thursby girls and my own daughters were very intimate. The Thursbys all belonged to the old Bushwick Dutch Reformed Church. Mr. Thursby was a regular church-goer, and was immensely interested in the Sunday-school and musical services. Emma and her sister were also regular attendants at the Sunday-school. They were very young, and Emma seemed almost a midget, she was such a pale little thing. When the musical services took place Emma joined in the singing with great delight. Her voice, though light, was clear and telling.

One evening Mr. Thursby invited me to come and spend the evening with him and a member of the church to talk over the possibilities of a church concert, in order to raise a fund for a new areas.

would use my best endeavors to secure voluntary talent. I had about completed my list when the thought occurred to me to give Emma a place on the programme, notwithstanding all the other performers were adults.
I immediately called on her father and mother and suggested the idea. It was met with all sorts of objections about her extreme youth, her lack of munical education, etc. Her father said she knew nothing to sing, and there would be no time to teach her anything.
Then all the performers were adults, and the Then all the performers were adults, and the idea of a mere child, no matter how precocious, appearing in a programme with singers of experience and ability was preposterous. I then proposed if her father and mother consented I would take Emma under instruction and teach has a size to see a second then proposed if her father and mother consented I would take Emma under instruction and teach her to sing two songs properly before the time of the concert. After much urging their consent was given, and the next day I began my duty as Emma's instructor.
She was not only very tractable and attentive, but enthusiastic. Her memory was very acute, so that I scarcely had occasion to repeat the instruction of the day previous. She went at her study with energy and determination to succeed. She committed the words to memory of the songs I selected for her, as well as the melodies before the expiration of the first week, and by the time the concert took place she was perfect in word and melody.

Finally the night of the concert come. It was Friday evening, January 5th, 185—. The church was filled, the various performers were all on time, and everybody scemed in the best of spirits. Emma was attended by her mother and a servant. My young popil great interest in the success of the adults who preceded her. The convert herean, two of the great interest in the success of the adults who preceded her. The concert began; two of the numbers were encored, and then came Emma's first number, "Hope, Our Guiding Star." I left the platform to go down to the lecture room and bring the little lady up. The stairway was a very narrow and steep one, and when I spoke to Emma and told her that it was her turn new to so on she evinced some was her turn now to go on, she evinced some nervousness and said "she couldn't climb up those high stairs."

"Never mind, dear," said I, "I will carry you up." I took her on my arm; she might have weighed sixty pounds, but I doubt if she weighed any more. I asked her if she was afraid to go before the audience. She hesitated as a way arrived at the entrance to the as soon as we arrived at the entrance to the way.

"Yes, I'm afraid," she said to me.

"Nonsense," I replied. "Come, he a brave girl, give me your hand and come along."

She looked up at me almost implicingly, evidently afraid. I assured her that she had nothing to fear, and then she gave me her little hand and we advanced to the front of the platform, where I left her receiving the plandits of her felends, while I went to the rounc and of her friends, while I went to the pinno and immediately commenced the introduction to her song. I had played it over and finding Emma was not ready to commence, I began a short improvisation, leading again to the subject. By this time, to my surprise, Emma was standing by my side. I spoke to her in an undertone encouragingly. She whispered, "I'm affaid," I kept on playing the introduction, and at last the said, "I'm ready."

Retaining her position, she commenced her song, gradually walking to the front. The appdause that followed was overwhelming, and she was compelled to repeat one verse. When I took her down to the lecture-room she was showered with compliments from the singers who had preceded her. Her second number was "The Star of Love," which she

Such were the circumstances which sur-rounded the first appearance of the songstress who to-day commands her own prices at leading corrects, and upon whom have been showers, the plaudits of the kings and queens of Europe, and the foremost men and women of her own land.

I was visiting an old school friend who never had allowed her household duties to prevent the daily hour or two at the pinno, which made her music such a pleasure to all. From a quantity of beautiapleasure is all. extra effort, and told me it was in preparation for the musicale of the next week, which 1, as her guest, was privileged to attend. I scarcely knew what to expect, my experience in that direction having been limited to several formal evening affairs in the city.

Late in the morning of the day appointed we went to the home of a neighbor, and found many congenial friends assembled. As we descended the stairs the perfume of flowers in vases, large and small, fragments of music and song softly rehearsed, and the gay chatter of a roomful of people, prepared us for the charming sight that greeted us. The pretty young hostess who not us so cordially, had transformed the homestend, one of the oldest in the town, into a thing of beauty. The spacious spartments with their deep window-sents and oaken panels remained as before, but portières, rogs and easy chairs made them luxurious. The rooms and wide hall were in the possession of matrons as well as maidens, for love of music, not age, was this assembly's criterion, and the girls fresh from college and conservatories of music were as welcome as those whose girlhood was twenty years back.

Soon after our arrival the secretary called the roll, each member present responding with some quotation in regard to music or musicians. The programme for the day included Mendelssohn, Mezzkowski and Kjerulf, the first two offering a choice between the selections essays on the composers were read, and the "Reporter" gave an excellent condensed account of affairs in the busical world. The programme consisted of twelve or more numbers, and in listening and discussing, two hours passed very pleasantly.

Luncleson was announced soon after the close of the programme, and some who were present insimilated that that was the most important fenture of the day. I will not deny that on this occasion it was to me, at least, a very enjoyable part. There were several tables ench seating eight, an arrangement which has an advantage over smaller tables in affording more space for decoration. The one which I was sented had an exquisite center-piece of Roman embroidery in white and gold, and the china was in dainty, old-fashioned shapes of the gilt-handed style which at home we children need to welcome with such glee as the "gold dishes." Chryanthemums were at their height and furnished the decorations; upon our table a yellow vase of golden beau-ties completing the picture, which was a feast in itself. The other tables were similarly ar-ranged in like, pink and white.

The luncleon was served by the young friends of the hosters, their dainty gowns, fresh faces, and skillful serving forming a delightful improvement on the efforts of the delightful improvement on the efforts of the hired waitnesses who, in small towns, are usually inefficient. First we were given potato croquettes and fried oysters, with the accompaniments of delicious coffee, bread and butter, then chicken salad with olives and wafers, and after that cake and ices. Between the courses we admired the embroidery, which was lavishly used everywhere, and in comparing the inscriptions on the cards by our plates, for it was the thirty-first of October, each of us found as a souvenir a card with an old saying concerning "All Hallow-E'en."

I may be too enthusiatic over this plan of meeting once in several needs to feast soul and body, but I see no reason to prevent the success of such an undertaking in any town. success of such an undertaking in any town.
One great advantage is the incentive to keep in practice; many girls after leaving college or conservatory of music find their first taste of society so alluring that there is great temptation to let the results of years of study disappear; but they soon find that the fingers which were so nimble need the daily bour or two at the plane. The busy housewives also are glad to keep informed concerning the new music and composers. Of course all of this has reference to an organization in a small town, for those living in cities have all the advantages of concerts and musical lectures.

On inquiry as to the history and rules of this society, I learned that from an original membership of seven or eight it had grown until it included twenty five regular me who were expected to add some part to the programme at each meeting; this seems to me a very pleasant number. A small yearly fee paid all current expenses, often leaving a generous sum for charity, or anything else of common interest.

III—THE PERSONALITY OF "PANSY"

By DENNY CORNELIUS JOHNSON

RITERS of marked ability and with great earnest ness of purpose must, of necessity, leave some im-print of their personality in their works. This is pre-eminently so of Mrs.

Isabella M. Alden, and all who have known and loved her as "Pansy," will find in her the realization of the ideal they have formed of her character through rending her books.

There is in and about her the same high standard of right and wrong; the same deeply-rooted principles; the same unselfalness of life and loving sympathy; the same bright, happy Christianity, and, above all the same entire consecration to the all, the same entire consecration to the Master and His service which breathes through all her writings. With her they are not mere theories, existing only on paper and in the author's mind, but are the rules that govern her own daily life.

Mrs. Alden is not one who decilies in the

Mrs. Alden is not one who, dwelling in the valley, tells of the imagined beauty of the mountain tops around, but, instead, tells of the beauty she knows is there; and, being a firm believer in practical Christianity, lends a belping hand to those who find the way steem full of suchs and wifells. But we strewn full of rocks and pitfalls. But so often the weary, footsore traveler does not recognize the hand that smoothed this bit of path, or pushed aside that jagged stone. For one of the strongest, and one of the most attractive elements in Mrs. Alden's character is her modesty and shrinking from publicity of any kind, and her humility in regard to the great good her works have accomplished, for self-emolument has no part in her work, but, instead, she has consecrated intellect, as well as heart and life, to the service of Christ.

Perhaps the ideas of the personal appearance of "Pansy" may be as many and varied as her readers themselves. All may not have pictured her as she is, a woman of less than needium height, with dark-brown hair and eyes of a like color. No photograph can ever do her justice, because it can give but one of the many expressions of the bright, carnest face, its changing lights being one of its greatest charms. The accompanying portrait, though one of the best and truest ever taken, while it shows the well-shaped head, with its wealth of brown hair, and the low, broad forehead, gives but a glimpse of the sweet, firm mouth, and fails entirely to tell of the clear, fresh complexion, and of the roses in the cheeks. It is sitogether powerles to neverless to mean clear, fresh complexion, and of the roses in the cheeks. It is altogether powerless to record the tender thoughtful expression in the eyes, and can, at best, only hint at the many others those brown eyes are capable of. For they are expressive, most wonderfully so! They are at all times full of sincerity, whether brimming over with merriment, filled with tender love for the dear ones in the home and dear friends outside the family circle; glowing with enthusiasm over some cause in which all their owner's sympathies are enlisted, or when lighted up with the perfect faith and trust that comes only from a "life that is hid with Christ in God," Mrs. Alden is a little near-sighted, and this imperfect vision makes it very difficult for her to remember faces, unless seen so often as to beto renember faces, unless seen so often as to be-come familiar. In manner she is unusualling, gental, refreshingly intural, and possessed of a gentle dignity that while repelling undue familiarity from efficies strangers, yet invites confidence from any who may used her help or sympathy. Dress is a matter of secondary importance to her, but she is always neatly and tastefully attired. She has an especial conference for contain shades of crey.

and instefally attired. She has an especial preference for certain slandes of gray.

It would be difficult to find two people bet-ter suited to each other, more tenderly devoted, or more thoroughly one, in all their interests and aims, than are Mrs. Alden and her hus-band, the Rev. G. R. Alden; and it would be hard to imagine a cheerier, brighter home than theirs in Washington. Dearly loving her home, Mrs. Alden is deeply interested in all that pertains to its comfort and happiness, and it is here, as perhaps nowhere else, that the beauty of her life and character are most plainly seen, and one can appreciate more fully than ever before the secret of her power over young people; for, beside the keen in-sight into human nature which makes her books so enjoyable, the moment you hear her clear, infectious laugh, you realize how thor-oughly young at heart she is.

To say that "Pansy" is a busy woman scarcely seems to express it, for the demands on her time and talent are constant and almost on her time and talent are constant and almost innumerable. Her morning hours are spent at work in her cozy study, uninterrupted, un-less by something very important. A good idea of what Mrs. Alden considers "very important," may be gathered from the fact that however crowded with work or pressed for time, she is always accessible to her family, or to callers, and her great love for children is evinced by the cherrfulness with which she will pause in the midst of her work, to meet a child who has come to visit her.

to meet a child who has come to visit her.

While engaged with some household duty, she frequently plans and thinks out the details of her stories, and when she enters her study it is always with her thoughts clearly defined and under perfect control; that they flow with ease and rapidity is attested by the stendy click of her type-writer keys, which can be heard through the closed doors.

The chance remark of a friend will sometimes cause the main outlines of a story to flash upon her mind, and filling these in at her leisure it may be two or three years before ashe begins to write it. Few corrections are required in her manuscript, and it is never copied. The incidents are seldom founded entirely on facts, but her characters are often drawn from life, and are sometimes a combination of different types, or often the characters of some in whom she has become interested, wrought out and developed, as she thinks they ought, or as she fears they will. Aside from being engaged in writing some serial, there are short stories for children for the magazine of which she and her husband are the editors; Sabbath school lessons to prepare for primary scholars, and the many articles promised to different periodiculs. Being thoroughly in sympathy with the Christian Endeavor movement, heartily and carnestly interested in all missionary and temperance work, there are urgent appeals from all these different organizations that she will take some part in the programme of their monthly, quarterly, or annual meetings, and once her consent is gained, there are short sketches appropriate to the occasion to be written for reading at that particular time, for it is almost an impossibility to induce her to make a "speech" or "address." Added to this is the great amount of mail received from young and old, strangers and friends, in all parts of the country. As much as possible of this is left in the hands of her secretary.

Mrs. Alden is a frequent sufferer from severe headaches, and because of this her afternoons are usually devoted to rest and recreation. And in the winter even promise, as be inherits from both father and mother their good and intellectual qualities. As soon as the first warm days of spring have given place to the more sultry ones of summer, the family hasten away to their retreat in the shady groves of Chautauqua.

To that unspeakable blessing, of a noble, Christian father and mother, and to their wise and loving care, tender and helpful training, and to the inspiration of their beautiful lives, Mrs. Aiden attributes, next to God, all that she has been able to accomplish. Some idea of the precious memory they left to their children may be found in the "dedication" of Mrs. Aiden's "Prince of Pence."

Especially was her father her inspiration to write, for when a mere child, and only able to write, for when a mere child, and only able to write in capital letters, he taught her to keep a daily diary, presumably for the convenience of the family. He also taught her to take notes of sermons, as she thought, solely for his pleasure and benefit, and in various ways constantly encouraged her to express her thoughts on paper. Looking back to that period, Mrs. Alden does not think he did this through any idea that she would be a writer, but because he believed the discipline of such a course to be good. But when this discipline of childhood began to bear fruit, and in early girlhood she had written a sketch cutified "Our Old Clock," which he wished to have published in the local paper, thinking it not wise for her own sake that it should be known to have been written by her, he gave her the pen name "Pansy," explaining that the word meant "tender and pleasant thoughts," such as she had always given him. There is a tra-dition in the family, however, that she had earned the name long before, when a very lit-tle girl she had packed all the "fowers" from her mother's large pansy bed, and then, with the utmost generosity, presented her with all

To the wise solicitude of her parents, lest the simplicity of her character should be marred by overmuch praise, is undonbtedly due the fact that, although the author of over one hundred books since then, and the recipient of unstinted and unlimited praise, her character is still as unspoiled as when she signed her name for the first time "Pansy."

EDNA LYALL AT HOME

BY FEEDERICK DOLMAN

HE young authoress of "Donovan" and "We Two" is one of the veiled personalities of literary England. She lives at one of the smaller south-coast pleasure towns, seldom romes to London and is never seen in that world of fashion and pleasare where most Americans pass the time of their visits to the mother country. During the last few years there have been few books more discussed in the drawing-room and at the dinner table than those published in the name of Edna Lyall, and very interesting, and name of Edna Lyall, and very interesting, and sometimes very amusing, has it been to hear the different ideas that some of their readers have formed of her personal characteristics. It need hardly be said that in most cases the imaginary Edna Lyall was in sharp contrast to the real Edna Lyall.

In thinking of Edna Lyall, the imagination of one of her London friends takes him sixty miles from London to an old-fashioned house in the pretty town of Eastbourne. The house seems old-fashioned, yet like most of the residences in Eastbourne it must have been built within the last twenty or thirty been built within the last twenty or thirty years. It is built of dark red brick in the Gothic style, and is ivy-covered; and having a quaint porch with an oval-shaped door has a venerable aspect that age has not earned. The roadway is studded with mountain-ash trees. Eastbourne is famous for its umbrageous thoroughfares, and the house is half hidden by foliage from its neighbors, as well as from passers by asers-by. The house is that of a clergy man, as its semiare house is that of a dergyman, as its semi-ecclesiastical appearance might well suggest, who married Edna Lyall's elder sister. The Rev. Mr. Jameson is curate of St. Saviour's Church, the principal edifice of the Established Church in Eastbourne, to which the authoress presented a peal of bells which were purchased with the revenue from the publication of "Don-ovan." From the windows of her room on ovan." From the windows of her room on the upper story of the house Edna Lyali can almost see the church, and the music of the bells sometimes gives its message to her ears as she writes. In this room were written "In the Golden Days," "Knight Errant," "A Hardy Norseman," and "The Autobiography of a Slander."

The room is furnished in accordance with the gospel of "plain living and high thinking;" there is taste and refinement, but nothing lavish or luxurious. Of half a dozen pictures on the wall I remember best the oil painting of the Battle of Trafalgar and the Taking of the "Téméraire," and an engraved portrait of Mr. Gladstone, who has no warmer adherent than the authoress of "Donovan." In one corner there is a type-writer, which is not yet a familiar object in the homes of English litterateurs. Edna Lyall's small library occupies the greater part of one side of the room.

Glancing at the titles of volumes one finds ample evidence of eclectic spirit and catholic tastes. Books on religion and theology are present in greatest force, but there is poetry, and phi-losophy, and history, and politics in pretty just preportions. Kingsley. Frederick Denison Maurice. Tennyson, and Whittier bear the signs of most

The eyes have lost a little of their luster and the checks the color they once possessed. The slight form is somewhat thinner, and the hand that clasps yours instinctively tells of much suffering. But a bright with a catholic rich thereto. smile is coupled with the assurance of con-valescence, and the voice, at first weak and low, gathers intonation and quiet force when the talk is on some stirring topic. Like Charlotte Bronte's heroine, Ada Ellen Bayley (the pseudonym, you see, is only a transposition of some of the letters in her baptismal name) has no beauty beyond that intellectual beauty to which Sheller wrote his well known by on. to which Shelley wrote his well-known hymn.
The face is small and of uneven formation, the broad forehead having a suggestion of the masculine that is scouted by the sweet and sympathetic expression of the eyes. The brown hair would be beautiful were it not cut short and arranged with an almost severe simplicity. She usually dresses in a close fit-ting garment of some plain material. Edna Lyall owes really all her charm to her sympa-thetic presence, if I may be pardoned the ex-pression, her spiritual earnestness and tender feeting. Pity is one of her predominant pression, her spiritual earnestness and tender feeling. Pity is one of her predominant qualities; there always seems to be an undercurrent of sadness in her character at the misery and wee in the world around her.

Edna Lyall has written her works mostly in the light and sunshine, of which Eastbourne obtains a very liberal share. She always writes in the morning, plying the type-writer for about two hours at a time, having previously shaped and formed each chapter in her own mind. Her first thought is of the chief character, the hero or heroine, of her story. Next comes the plot, the circumstances and incidents necessary to bring out the findividuality of this character. She then makes some slight sketches of the minor members of the dramatis persone, and she is ready to of the dramatis personic, and she is ready to begin the novel. The time she spends upon it greatly varies. Having great fondness for travel, the progress of the work may be intertravel, the progress of the work may be inter-rupted by a visit to the Continent. A good part of "Donovan," however, was netually written while traveling in Italy. Although Edna Lyall has only just entered the thirties, not one of her eight works has been written in a hurry, or even in response to the com-mands of her publishers. Defore writing "In the Golden Days" she made an exhaustive study of the period in which its story was placed, reading Welwood's "Memoirs," Lut-trell's "Diary," "Macaulay's History," and other less-known authorities. Rarely joining the gay throng on East-other less-known authorities.

Rarely joining the gay throng on Eastbourne's esplanade or pier during its summer season, Edna Lyall is fond of rambling or driving through the pretty scenery by which the town is surrounded. At many houses in the town she is a welcome visitor, although as a rule she shuns even the literary and artistic society that is to be found in Eastbourne. When her natural timidity has been over-come she has sometimes greatly pleased a overcome she has sometimes greatly pleased a small circle of friends by some recitations from the poets. For the drama in fact, she has the whole-hearted admiration that so many the poets. For the drams in fact, she has the whole-hearted admiration that so many members of her church cannot give, and in her opinion no recreation is so good as a good play well acted. On the other hand no unprofessional musician could exhibit keener delight in listening to Beethoven's "Mounlight Sonata" and Mendelssohn's symphony in "The Hymn of Praise." And this reminds me of an anecdote which was told to me a short time ago by Mary Davies, the renowned Welsh singer. She was spending a holiday in Norway, and at the hotel had made the acquaintance of a young lady with whom she took long walks. Among the many things of which they conversed was music and the life of the musician. Her companion took the higher view of the subject, and made use of words which forcibly recalled to Mary Davies' mind a novel she had read a short time before, which was none other than "Knight Errant." Up to that moment the singer had been known to the singer as Miss Davies, and the novelist to the singer as Miss Davies, and the novelist to the singer as Miss Bayley, but the next moment the truth flashed across their minds.

Every reader of "Knight Errant," and "A Hardy Norseman" must have noticed how these novels are permeated with the spirit of the time. This is not surprising, seeing that Hardy Norseman" must have noticed how these novels are permeated with the spirit of the time. This is not surprising, seeing that Edna Lyall is a diligent reader of the newspa-pers. But although keenly interested in the questions and events of the hour, Edna Lyall takes no active part in politics. She thinks women can do more lasting service to their country in the education of children, in infusing their minds with the best sentiments in recard to public affairs than by speaking on platforms or canvassing for votes. This feel-ing is in unison with the deep affection that she has for the home and for family life.

A FEW GENERAL SUGGESTIONS

ABOUT THE WISE MANAGEMENT OF CHURCH FAIRS AND SUPPERS hind the times in such matters, for the social life of churches and their various auxiliary societies must depend largely upon the help such entertainments can give, and, in many, yes, the majority of cases, the financial life draws a goodly measure of its sustenance from these sources. Large and wealthy churches are no exception to this rule, for their charities and schemes for help-fulness are multiplied accordingly. The rule, for their charities and schemes for helpfulness are multiplied accordingly. The church that does not dip to the bottom of its treasury purse a good many times during the year has a weak sort of mission in this up-anddoing world. It takes money, and plenty of it, too, to feed the real, vital, energetic life of a wide-awake, up-and-doing church. Hence the need of church suppers and fairs.

Though methods of work in the main are about the same from year to year, a new appearance must be put on, and fresh schemes invented to keep up the interest, and to attract and hold the young people. The same sugacity in d business way that makes a weekday enterprise prosper must enter into the suggesty in a business way that makes a weekday enterprise prosper must enter into the management of all church work. So the very first requirement in arranging church fairs, sociables, suppers, etc., is that after choosing something attractive to present to be public no pains be spared in carrying out the idea.

A half dozen shabbily gotten up sociables and suppers or bazars are enough to dishearten the most carnest congregation. So above all things let all work in this line be done well.

NEXT, everybody must be enlisted to belp along the work. And how can this be done? Easily enough. The very first work that the committee chosen to manage a fair or parish supper ought to do is to make sore that every family in the entire parish be called upon by a committee specially chosen for that work, and that all be asked to be belong either by contribution or retrouses. for that work, and that all be asked to be helpers either by contribution or patronage—by both, if possible. In nine cases out of ten the desired belp will be forthcoming. Then bring to the front new people. Set them to work and make them feel that they are needed. Let the proverbial "half dozen people who run the church" be multiplied to a hundred half dozens. Do not send printed slips asking for co-operation in church work, but send a live, working member who will be sure to carry the invitation in the right way.

CHURCH suppers should not be too formal, neither should a certain degree of conventional form be lacking. In no case should new-comers be overlooked, for it is their opportunity for getting acquainted. While introductions should be made a special care by those who have been long in the church, strangers ought to waive formalities and be ready to meet other strangers with cordiality. The same degree of fact that enables a bostess The same degree of tact that enables a hostess in her own home to seat congenial people side by side, or vis-a-vis, should, so far as possible, enter into the plan of seating guests at church suppers.

A MONG the various suggestions which this page offers, something suited to the need of each individual parish may be selected. There is still another call which naturally suggests itself here. In large cities and towns cer-tain charitable enterprises demand the united fain charitable enterprises demand the united effort of all churches as well as the co-operation of the public generally. A hospital is to be built or a public library founded, and something gotten up on an elaborate plan is required. Just here the kirmiss seems to meet that demand. Properly speaking, the kirmiss limits itself to the representation of a certain type of life or a special period of history, Latterly the name has been applied less literally, and all sorts of sales, fairs, etc., have been dignified by the title of kirmiss.

A DUTCH kirmiss, for instance, aims to reproduce as nearly as possible within the space of a large hall, rink or garden, the architecture, streets, trees, floral and general features of a Dutch village. It dresses the young people in Dutch costumes, and they endeavor by song, music, etc., to represent the manners, customs, industries, literature and something of the language of Dutch villagers. Many people, are required for such a representapeople are required for such a representa-tion, who must give weeks of their leisure time in preparation for an event which, if it be not elaborately and effectively presented, fails completely. Under the direction, however, of a manager thoroughly acquainted with life in Holland, and who has sufficient invention to bring out the most unique and interesting features of Dutch life, this kirmiss presents an entertainment well deserving the most generous patronage.

S especially appropriate to the present year, the fourth centennial anniversary of the discovery of America, a kirmiss representing a New England village at the end of the first century of colonial life offers to students of American bistory a most interesting and timely object lesson. In connec-tion with this, a pageant representing the suc-In conneccession of important historical events which occurred during the first hundred years of our colonial life, presented by a series of tableaux vivants, somes and processionals, interspersed with such musical airs as were popular during that period, is a suggestion worthy the best effort of any society.

Young ladies can represent Greek statuary beautifully. A dark curtain for a background relieved by flowers; a pedestal covered with white cloth: "statues," whitened, then draped in white a la Gree; magnesium lights, and a reader of extracts from Greek mythology are the necessary requirements.

handle is wrapped in plain or em-broidered ribbon. This same plan may be adapted to a plain clothes-brush; that is, it may be covered with brocade, and instead of fringe a narrow, gold galloon is fastened on with tiny tacks. This makes a pretty addition to one's toilet table.

Telegram cases are made of fine white linen. The words "Special Glad Tidings" are painted on the outside in green and gold, and a pole and wires in a dashing sketch decorates the cover also. The telegram slips are held inside with triangular corner pieces of linen. An inch-wide green ribbon of a pretty shade runs through the center of the book and is tied in loops and ends at the top. The case is made over a foundation of stiff muslin, and folded together to the center, then neatly sewed at the edges. The joining inside is hidden by the ribbon which passes over it.

PRETTY cases for pin books are made of silk, or brocade, or even of plain white or gray linen, with daintily embroidered little blossoms of blue, pink or yellow. The cover is bound with narrow ribbon and the pin book is fitted in it, the paper flap being removed. Three holes are pierced through the lower edge, and ribbon is run in and out and then tied around the case in a bow.

Pretty sachets, which are simple and inexpensive, are made of fine cambric handkerchiefs. The handkerchief is embroidered in each corner with a flower. A piece of silk nearly the size of the handkerchief is used for lining, the corners being rounded off. The silk lining is filled with cotton in which violet or beliotrope powder is thickly sprinkled. The handkerchief is then carefully drawn over this lining with a thread just below the hem. A ribbon is tied about it, and the little ends of the handkerchief are neatly and jauntily pulled into shape. Lined with blue, pink or violet, and with ribbon and embroidery to correspond, these sachets are readily sold, as they are useful to scatter through bureau drawers, and have the advantage of being easily refilled.

Silver handled scissors form such an important adjunct to one's dressing table nowadays that cases are made for them somewhat after the plan of an old-fashioned slipper watch-case. The case is ent out in cardboard, covered with brocade or silk, and edged with allows cond.

NEW fashion for tobacco pouches is to A make a simple square bag, about six by five inches in size, of chamois leather, which five inches in size, of channels leather, which is to be had in such lovely shades of tan, grey, fawn, pale violet and the tint called elephant skin. Across the top, if a violet shade is chosen, purple pansies may be painted, three on each side, and the top cut out to form a border. A touch of gold point ornaments the edges of the flowers, and a tracery of gold runs across the bag in two bands, between which holes are cut, and through them is passed a rather heavy silk cord. These bags also serve to hold opera glasses. Bags for opera glasses are also of broade. The lower part of the bag is of cardboard, cut somewhat larger than the upper part of an ordinary opera glass, and covered with the same material as the bag.

BAGS for holding soiled lingerie are made D of colored linen, and worked in flax threads or cotton. They may also be very simply arranged by sewing together two towels which have effective borders and deep fringe. The tops of the towels are turned over and a stitching forms a casing in which a ribbon is run to draw up the bag. A stitching must run across the lower part of the bag just above the ornamental border; thus the bag is formed. The word "Lingerie" may be worked across in A traveling case for a sca Russian stitch. voyage is made of dark blue linen, bound with red or white braid. There are six pockets, in which brush, comb. slippers, etc., may be placed. One pocket lined with oil-silk is necessary for a sponge, and has a flap with a button. A border is left across the top, on which the words "Bon Voyage" are embroidered. A useful case for ordinary travel is made of blue linen, bordered with white braid. There are various pockets marked in white; viz., brush, comb, sundries.

Pretty cases for night dresses are of silk, trimmed around with a frilling of folded silk or a ruffle of lace, and a ribbon twisted diago-nally across with a bow at either end. They may also be made of sateen or pretty cretonne and edged with a frill of sateen to harmonize with the prevailing color.

A charming coverlet is of dark blue silk, with a border of white linen, on which is worked a scroll design in three shades of blue crewel, and finished off with a broad frill of blue silk. More simple coverlets are made of India silk or foulard. One was seen which of purple iris. The coverlet was lined with yellow India silk, and the inner bining of cotton wadding was held in place with full tuffs of purple iris. of narrow yellow ribbon.

OST successful among church festivals are those which re-produce old New England merry-makings. Such an one merry-makings. Such an one was recently arranged by the young people of a Boston church society. They named it the "Festival of Mondamen," in honor of Longfellow's beautiful poem, "Blessing the Cornfler's," choosing from that poem these lines as their motto:

"Let us gather in the harvest,

Stocks of unhusked corn stand here and there among barrels and boxes, rakes, shovels, scythes, baskets, ox-yokes, harness, etc. In the center is a heap of unbusked corn. Shoe and salt boxes, also millting stools and old-fashioned chairs, are arranged for scating the huskers. Chinese lanterns are plentifully added to the stable lanterns are plentifully added to the stable lanterns in general use. The "barn," when tastefully arranged, makes a pretty picture in itself.

Soon the old farmer and wife in old-time costume appear—he with a few noore stools, she bearing an armful of chintz-covered cushions. They chat plensantly in old New England tongue over their preparations until a chorus of happy voices singing a merry harvest glee heralds the arrival of the guests, who are welcomed warmly with real New England hospitality. The company group themselves around the corn-pile and go at their work.

The old farmer—a noted punster—calls upon his guests for songs, choruses, recitations, etc., etc. Their responses farnish the evening's entertainment, and the variety offered is unique. The city friends sing, play and recite in modern fashion, while the old folks and country lads and lasses sing many versed songs and ditties and "fler whistling, jewsbarp and comb choruses and "chop wood" in rhythmic measure to the rausic of fiddle and fife.

SUGGESTIO

N anticipation of the boliday season, when suggestions in woman's bandiwork are generally most acceptable, THE LADIES' HOME JOURNAL presents to its readers this month the following three extra pages especially prepared for it, entirely given over to ideas in neealework.

DRAWN WORK EFFECTS WITH EMBROIDERY By Mrs. Barnes-Bruce

HE constant demand for new and attractive methods in decorative needlework has led to the suggestion of introducing simple drawn work effects, together with ordinary embroidery, in the execution of floral subjects. Very beautiful and uncommon results can be obtained in this manner, and the pieces of work herewith illustrated were specially designed to demonstrate how admirably the idea can be worked out for various purposes.

A SOFA-PILLOW OF POPPLES

IN the really unique design for a sofa pillow (Illustration No. 1) it will be seen that the poppy, with its peculiarly shaped seed pod, was found to lend itself in the most satisfac-

The whole manner of treatment and the arrangement of this subject is particularly good, both in principle and execution, and may well be regarded as a les-son in the art of designing. The growth and

The subject may be carried out in various methods. It is intended to be worked upon white linen. One suggestion is to make it up over black or dark green velvet, rendering the drawn work stitches in light green silk. The delicate pinks employed in the poppies must be repeated in the border by introducing them into the coloring of the pods. This will produce a particularly handsome and luxurious effect, which may be further enhanced by finishing the pillow with a soft, full ruffle of white null. The design may also be worked upon silk of an ècru shade, over a pale pink foundation, with threads introduced in green. The edging may be of a full silk moss fringe. The flowers are worked in long and sbort stitch, and the stamens in French knots.

A VIOLET BUREAU SCARF

IN the design for a bureau L scarf, of which one-half is shown in the drawing (Illustra-tion No. 2) the forms for the violets are cut out of the ma-terial, and buttonholed around, the spaces being filled in with threads and stitches in drawn work fishion, to indicate the petals and veining of the flowers. The fabric employed flowers. The fabric employed is fine linen lawn over a violet satin lining. The flowers and buds are rendered in silk of a lighter shade than the satin foundation. The leaves, stems and the buttonholing which indicates, as will be seen, forms suggestive of the shape of the leaves, are all worked in delicate shades of green. In executing the violets, the divisions of the petals are made by of the petals are made by tightly twisted bars, each petal being filled in with three threads, with forms in darning stitch introduced toward the base, which are in fact, when combined the ordinary star form so frequently used in lace or drawn work. The buttonholing all around is the only finish actually required.

A GRACEFUL TEA-CLOTH

THE tea-cloth, of which one corner is shown in Illustration No. 2 to make the corner is shown I in Illustration No. 3, is, when worked out, extremely dainty and graceful. The inner row of drawn work blocks, form, in the complete design a square which may be laid either on the table against the edge, or allowed to full just over the corners hanging over the sides of the table. The cloth here pictured mensures forty-five inches each way and the sections of drawn work are two inches and half square. It is made of fine linen or lawn, and is laid over a colored silk cloth to barmonize with the coloring chosen for the morning-glories, either rose, pink or violet looking well. The design may be worked either all in white, or in pink and white, with the green leaves, or in purple and white, or all these tints may be harmoniously combined. If blue be preferred, the flowers should be in blue and white, and the cloth laid over blue silk or state. The field around the cipher, which should represent the initials of the owner, is filled in with drawn work to match the border. The letters are worked solidly in French embroidery, the open spaces being rendered with a drawn work device.

A CURTAIN BAND

THE design for a band for sash curtains (Illustration No. 5) may be used in two different ways. It can be employed horizon-tally, as shown in the drawing, for a band across the top of a single curtain, which may be either plain, gathered or plaited, and sewn on to it. If plain, the curtain should have discs, sim-ilar to those in the embroidered band, worked in it at inter-vals. The discs are buttonholed around, cut out of the material and afterward filled in, as out of the material and afterward filled in, as shown, with a simple net stitch, for which, however, more elaborate devices may be substituted if preferred. If the curtain be plaited, a simple hemstitch is all the finish required. If it be gathered, either a very few discs may be worked in it, or a simple boader in drawn work may be used instead. The flowers of the trumpet vine and the leaves are embroidered in outline in their natural colors, the material being white, of canvas, linen, SUGGESTIONS TO NEEDLEWOMEN

THE treatment of the subject of the tea-cloth in flustration No. 3 will well repay attention. It is a good example of semi-con-ventional treatment. The drawing of the flow-or constraint; they represent the natural growth, and yet are entirely obedient to the requirements of the design. The main lines

As a matter of fact, the proper treatment of flowers in making designs for needlework needs a very thorough knowledge of the principles involved. In the first place, good appreciation of the habits, growth and formation of the plants or vines is a necessary rea necessary re-quirement. Be-yond that, one must have a knowledge of the fonn-dation of lines and curves upon which all design is based; for, although less apparent in the kind of treatment usually adopted for subjects for embroidery, it is no less necessary than in the most correct and elaborate architectura

In this case a few of the discs may be introduced in the body of the curtains. The discs are to be worked in white. ### DRAWN WORK FOR THE TABLE By Maude Haywood

ARTISTIC END FOR A BUFFET SCARF (Illus. No. 1)

N deciding upon the most beautiful and the most appropriate method of decorating linen for the table, the preference may well be given to the exquisite art of drawn work, wrought with thrends in the very fabric itself. Not only is it unsurpassed in its exquisite daintiness of effect, but it has the merit, also, not so universally recognized, of being, even in the most delicate specimens, in reality wonderfully strong and durable; it will outlive endless washings, strong and durable washings, coming out each time as good and fresh as when first made, until it becomes actually worn out through constant usage, which, if the pieces are properly cared for, will not happen for many years. So that, as a matter of fact, if women would only renlize it, this extremely dainty kind of needlework, although taking long to make and command of facilies. make and com-manding fairly high prices, may, after all, be considered economical in the end, by reason of its dura-

the proverbial patience and ingenuity of those women who are real lovers of dainty needlework have enabled them to produce the most claborate and intricate designs, which call forth justly the wondering admiration of the uninitiated. The work has to-day lost none of its popularity, and indeed may be deemed to be in special favor at the exactly alike. The design out, is formed with six rows of double Solomon knots. This pattern being simple and straight-forward in its execution, may be regarded as a good one for an inexperienced worker to select.

it is intended. Reckon the measurement, in-cluding the depth required all around for the fringe, and cut out the square of lines re-quired, drawing a thread to act as a guide to the scissors in order to insure accuracy. In the example shown, three-quarters of an inch

Overcast or buttomhole the cut edges of the sources. Withdraw all the lengthof the squares. Withdraw all the length-wise threads of the oblong spaces, knot the threads into strands, containing, in the ex-ample shown, four threads each, either by penns of a hemselfching or knot chain. Then proceed to make the design by tying Then proceed to make the design by tring the strands according to the illustration, putting in first the horizontal and afterward the diagonal threads, and making a "spider" by possing the working thread several times around, in and out of the foundation threads, in the center of each open space. The corners should be left until the last, and the threads not be drawn before the threads come for weaking them. before the time comes for working them, the raw edges being buttonholed immedi-ately they are cut. Launder the work be-fore drawing the threads for the fringe.

SIMPLE AND PRETTY

THE pretty but simply made doily, Illustration No. 3, by May Fornerook, presents few difficulties in its execution. The size is nine inches, of which one inch is allowed for the fringe, and three-eighths of an inch for the receipths of an inch for the receipths. fringe, and three-eighths of an inch for the narrow outer border. The threads are withdrawn, according to the illustration, allowing five inches for the open spaces, and half an inch for the groups of threads. Buttonhole the raw edges, and stretch the linen in order to work the pattern on the wrong side. Each open square is worked separately. Fasten the working thread into one corner of an open square, knot one-half of the loose threads securely in the center, not drawing the half of the loose threads securely in the center, not drawing the thread up too tightly; loop the thread through the next corner, and so on around the square. Next pass the thread through each of the loops so made, and finally run it around through each of the second row of loops, drawing it up smoothly so as to form a small ring in the center. Put in the diagonal threads, which are knotted where they cross over the plain squares of the linen, upon the right side, and finish the doily with the row of feather-sttching, the fringe being raveled out last of all.

A HANDSOME TRAY CLOTH

A BORDER design for a handsome tray cloth, by the same hand, of which one corner is shown in Illustration No. 4, is worked in rather coarse linen. The central border in the design is two inches wide, with a narrower row of drawn work on either side, separated by plain strips of the linen, finished with rows of feather-stitching. The corners are left untouched until the rest of the border is finished, and then worked one after the other according touched until the rest of the border is finished, and then worked one after the other according to the method suggested in the directions for executing example No. 2. The illustration is sufficiently clear for a worker of very little experience to be able to follow it out with ease. The cloth may be finished either with a hemistich or fringe, according to taste. In this case the spider forms are given a more raised appearance by looping the working thread around the foundation thread as it is passed around, instead of merely employing the darning stitch.

ELABORATE SIDE-BOARD CLOTH

THE remaining pieces on this page, shown in Illustrations Nos. 5, 6 A shown in Illustrations Nos. 5, 6 and 7, were executed under the direction of Mrs. Barnes-Bruce, of New York. The design for a side-board cloth, of which both the front and back corners are shown, is a particularly handsome and elaborate one. The pattern was worked in 6cru thread. The size of the cloth is, or course to sait the particular piece of course, to suit the particular piece or furniture for which it is intended. The threads are withdrawn for the main portion of the design in squares, measuring half an inch to five-eighths of an inch across. It will be noticed that a great variety of stitches are in-troduced, and that labor has not been spared upon the work. Such an un-dertaking is suitable, of course, only for an avvert and rapid worker but for an expert and rapid worker, but the result when finished amply repays the skill and time bestowed.

Recently Mrs. Barnes-Bruce designed an extremely handsome and novel tablecloth in linen drawn work, novel tablecloth in linen drawn work, which for its originality and beauty well deserves description. It was intended for a party of eight persons. Instend of using cover doilies, the design for each doily was worked in the cloth Itself, and connected by a narrow border, running close to the edge of the table, and having elaborately wrought corners; a deep and handsome border was also worked upon the sides and ends of the linen. The design for the center piece, and also for two smaller mats at either end of or the lines. The design for the center piece, and also for two smaller mats at either end of it, were likewise made of drawn work in the cloth itself. This exquisite piece of handlwork when used was placed over colored silk, reaching just to the edge of the table, the tone being selected to accord with the floral decorations employed, yellow being chosen for white or yellow flowers, pale pink with roses of the same hue. In suggesting such an idea with a view of its adaptation by ambitious needle-women, it would be well to emphasize the fact that considerable skill and artistic judgment is needful in order to design effectively such an important piece of work. The general lines and proportions of the various patterns must be good and in keeping. It is not energial that in detail the devices be pretty claborate and perfectly rendered, the design as a whole needs an expert to conceive and to arrange it adequately. A further nevelty is the introduction of letters forming the monogram, rendered mainly in drawn work. This is a pretty idea also for tablecloths or napkins for more ordinary use, which are finished with a hemstitch or simple border in drawn work. The letters of the monogram should measure three to four inches in beight. Great care must, of course, be taken to preserve the symmetry of the design.

The finish may be either of the linen plainly turned under and hemstitched, or raveled out, as in the illustration, to form a fringe, which can be kept in order by smoothing it out with a small whisk brush.

For the benefit, however, of those who may wish to undertake the whole of the work for themselves, the entire process of preparing, starting, executing and finishing it will be thoroughly explained from beginning to end. ning to end.

It will be thoroughly explained from beginning to end.

The title "Ideal Honiton" is particularly appropriate, owing to the fact that the various braids which, applied on the linen ground, form the basis of all the designs, are manufactured to exactly imitate the best known of the patterns used in real Honiton lace, which is manufactured on pillows by the peasant women of Devonshire, in England. These braids are imported in different widths, to sait the various purposes for which the work is appropriate, a judicious arrangement of the coarser and more delicate patterns enhancing the beauty and effectiveness of the designs into which they are wrought.

As a general rule, a good quality of linen lawn is considered the best fabric to employ for the ground upon which the pieces are worked. In every case, the braid is applied by means of a buttonhole stitching in white embroidery silk; and, according to individual taste and requirements, the designs are more or less enriched by means of various lace stitches rendered in point-lace thread.

As will be seen in studying them carefully, the illustrations given here vary greatly in respect of their elaborateness or simplicity or dead; and the center pieces, with doilies to match, will be described in their order of difficulty as to execution. It would be a good thing for a beginner to commence upon such a piece as the doily in Hiustration No. 2, as it is small in size, not involving much outlay for materials or any great expenditure of time. Nevertheless, in the carrying out and completing this design, sufficient experience in the work will be gained to considerably lessen the difficulties of future and more ambitious undertakings.

other stitch being employed upon this piece of work, which is, nevertheless, particularly pretty and quaint, both in shape and design. As is all the pieces shown upon this page, and for every design which is equal in height and width, whether round or square in shape, the work is started upon an accurately cut square of linen, which, in this instance, measures twenty-six inches each way, the mat to be twenty-four inches in size when finished. The linen is then carefully doubled over and creased both up and down, across and diagonally, in order to divide it into eight equal parts, and thus using these marks as guides, to ensure an necurate setting of the braid in position. Measure the distance at which it is necessary to place the braid to start each section of the design, namely, about nine inches from the center of the linen, then counting the divisions of the braid, notice that fifteen are required for each quarter of the mat, the middle or eighth one coming exactly on the diagonal dividing mark, and being placed by measurement, fifteen inches from the center. These eight points being correctly formed the curving of the braid and busting it carefully in position should prove an easy matter; but too much emphasis cannot be laid on the importance of getting the shape of the mat properly and accurately made. The placing of the sections of the braid pointing in gard, to complete the border pattern, is next in order, and easily accomplished. Each bow-knot is similar in position and arrangement. In sewing down the braid, it has to be firmly basted on the outside at each turn, and on the inner edge gathered with a fine thread, in order to make it lie flat. The center of each bow-knot is formed by a piece of the braid used in the border. The work being thus prepared, the buttonholing may be commenced. In the pieces sketched here, Japan wash silk was employed for the purpose. Except for the outer edge, the buttonholing is done in one bong, and two slaprt strictes, with care that each stitch is taken exactly at right a sewn down, a slant-wise or uneven direction of the silk giving a very undesirable effect. For the scalloped edge, the linen is sloubled edge, the liner is doubled under to give an added firm-ness, having been previously cut to the necessary shape and size, following the out-line of the mat. When all line of the mat. When all the work is fluished, the lines is cut away from benestly the braid and the edges neatly trimmed with a pair of sharp scissors. Finally, the piece must be carefully pressed in the following number. Lay the work, right side downward, on an ironing-board covered with a clean flaund; wet a piece of very thin muslin with water, wring it out as dry as jasseible, lay it over the wrong side of the work, and then from it until the muslin is quite dry. Strip-the muslin off and the linen should be perfectly smooth, and without arms. The and without creases. The work may be repeatedly laundered without injury.

A TASTEFUL SIMPLE DOILY

THE doily shown in Illustration No. 2 is designed to go with the center piece already described. It is particularly simple in execution, and the design can be readily enlarged and adapted for cover doilies, or rendered in finer bruids, and so made smaller if required. The one shown in the illustration is made upon a series and a half inch square of linen, measuring six and a half inches when finished, and is the size for a finger-bowl doily, being a square doily turned sideways in the drawing.

THE FLORAL SPRAY CENTER PIECE

with doily in style to match (Illustration No. 7) is extremely graceful and pretty in effect. It is prepared upon a twenty-nine inch square of linen, divided into eight parts, as described above, in order to facilitate the shaping of the mat, and the placing of the floral sprays. The latter are worked separately, being afterward basted in position, and ap-placing of the floral sprays. The latter are worked separately, being afterward basted in position, and applied with the usual buttonhole edging. These sprays can be bought ready made, but may be easily worked by any one acquainted with the simple point-lace stitches, and willing to spend the necessary time upon them. For those, however, with little leisure, or, perhaps, not overmuch skill, it will prove a great saving of trouble to procure them ready to apply. They are made upon a pattern, as in lace work. The braid is basted down upon blue mustin, upon which the outline of the design has been traced, as shown in Illustration No. 6. The braid is then caught together for each leaf and petal, with a double net stitch in point-lace thread, (of course, not taking the stitches through to the mustlin pattern) and a "spider" forms the center of each flower. When finished, the basting threads are taken out, thus releasing the spray from the mustlin background. In the doily (Illustration No. 7) the flowers and leaves are formed by pieces of a finer braid than that used for the edge, and do not have to be worked separately, but simply applied in the usual manner, the stem being embroidered inoutline, and the centers in satin stitch.

Any of the forms found in good lace designs may be appropriately adapted for execution in Ideal Honiton, but care should be

The center mat is made upon a twenty-four inch square of linen, but the piece, when finished, measures about twenty-seven inches as the points are made beyond in the following nammer: After the nut has been prepared, and the brain for the herrier has been bosted down in the manager already known to the reader, the lines is cat away all around, following an langinary line running through the center of the outer now of braid, and paper is basted behind the lizen all azonnel, upon which the border of points is formed in suitable braid, and the are alliches afterward inserted. The size of each point, which should be an inch and three-quarters in the present instance, must be carefully measured and marked on the paper, in order to ensure accouracy. The braid is then basted to the paper, as in making point lace, and such point is filled in with various stitches, as shown in the illustration, point-lace thread No. 250 being used for the purpose. The floral sprays are made in the same man-ner as for the round center piece. The points for the duily are made similarly to those on the center mat, and this finish may be suitably employed, if desired, in connection with any of the other designs illustrated on this page, with the result in each case of enhancing the beauty and richness of the pieces. Sometimes lace is used with excellent effect as an edging to this kind of work. A tea-cloth recently made in Ideal Hauiton, upon bosom linen, was finished in this manner with very satisfactory result.

BEST USES OF IDEALI HONITON

Total Honiton is principally used for table decoration, and also for bureau covers. A complete set of the requisite mots and doilles intended for use upon a polished table was ordered, not long ago, by a woman of taste, and well deserves description. It woman of taste, and well deserves description. It comprised a large center mat in a bow-knot design, similar to that in Illustration No. 1, and with the pointed edging shown in Illustration No. 4; two carver's cloths, in size twenty-four by eighteen inches, with a similar design adapted to the clongated shape, and also having the pointed edging; four carste mats, measuraquare, and with a bow-four carafe mats, measuring twelve inches square, and with a bow-knot in one corner only of each mat, the braid used for these and the carver's cloths being finer than that employed for the center piece; two almond tray mats, oval shaped, rendered in a plain bordering of a fine braid, as in Illustration No. 5, but omitting the pointed edging; eight finger-bowl doilies, as in Illustration No. 2, and a tea cozy, shaped to correspond with the style of the center mat, but omitting the pointed edging, having little bow-knots scattered all over it, and made up over a cozy of pale pink silk. Of course, cover doilies, sixteen inches square, ies, sixteen inches square, and a Roman punch set, could very suitably be added to the above list. added to the above list. Bureau scarfs are usually made having two pairs of mats to correspond in style, each pair being different in shape and size.

The long-shaped pieces to go down the middle of the table and taking the place of the center and side mats, called usually table runners, are reviving in mans, career usuarry table runners, are reviving in popularity, and are much liked in this style of work. Border designs are usually employed, but a pretty and more uncommon method is to carry the work also around the place where the center ornament should stand.

The very newest thing in Ideal Houiton is to employ it in decorating the covers of mouchoir or bandkerchief sacheta, which are made up over a pale-colored silk foundation, the lines having they scattered sprays embroidered all over it in Dresden style. These will make particularly movel and during Christmess citic particularly movel. style. These will make and dainty Christmas gifts.

son hundreds of us, men andwomen alike, men and women alike, are walking interro-gation points. Daily, yea hourly, the ques-tion comes up: "What presents shall I give for Christmas?" and a week before Christ-mas Day finds many as far from a solution as far from a solution of the problem as when it first presented itself. And when the object of a Christmas remembrance belongs to the masculine tribe, the problem is and to this one has of inky remembrance belongs to the masculine tribe, the problem is apt to take on a hue of inky blackness in the mind of a woman, and she asks herself, and others: "Now, if he was a woman I would know what to give, but what does a man want?" With the presents most appreciated by women these remarks will not deal. THE LADIES HOME JOURNAL will, in its next issue, endeavor to be of some assistance to its readers in that direction by the presentation of an entire page, prepared with much care. These present comments will try to care. These present comments will try to point out to women the kind of presents which find most favor with men.

A MAN is an exceedingly peculiar being in many respects. If he is anything he is practical, and this is particularly true of him in the matter of Christmas presents. The first thing that occurs to a man's mind when he receives a present is, "How can I use it?" The purely ornamental has with him, as a rule, only a passing interest. He likes to see pretty things in his home, but he would far rather give them than receive them. He is prosaic. give them than receive them. He is prossic.
The gift which means most to him is that which will in some way add to his comfort.
He wants to use his presents. "What good is a thing unless you can use it?" is his argument, and into practical argument. and into practical service he immediately seeks to puts practical present, while the pretty knick-knack is looked at once, admired—and put away. Not that he is inappreciative if the gift comes to him in the shape of a dainty knick-knack, but he will enjoy a practical and useful present far more. And after all, this is the mission of the Christmus present—remembrance; and a man always remembers that which a woman does to make his life easier and his comfort more comfortable. There are, of course, exceptions in the tastes of men. Some men like their presents to tend toward the pretty and the useless, the dainty and the ornamental, preferring themselves to supply their own useful needs, but these men are in the minority. The wise woman is she who, in selecting a present, thinks of the practical man rather than of the other sort.

TAKE a man, for example, who spends evenings at home with his family and enjoys reading. The first thing which naturally suggests itself is to present him with one or more of the latest books. Now, books are al-ways acceptable presents to a man fond of aling, and in many cases they form the best Many a man's pleasure is spoiled by reading under gualight or by the "electrics," and to that man the most welcome gift would be a student's lamp, green-shaded and of softened ray. To him, too, one of those big easy armethairs, into which a man likes to bury himself, would be a source of endless comfort.

A padded foot rest, a more comfortable home gown than he now has, a smoker's stand, so that he need not rise for a match or to deposit the ashes from his cigar—or knock them on the carpet, as the best of men will do, you know— any one of these items will find hearty appre-ciation, because the gift carries with it a remembrance of his comfort, and that is what a man most seeks and enjoys when he is at home in the evening.

IF a man has a nook of his own in his If a man has a nook of his own in his home, what men are apt to call their "den," the Christmas gift cannot be better than something which will enter into the practical spirit of that room. If he has used a writing table, or if his present desk has outgrown his papers, the most acceptable gift would be one of those roller-top desks of generous capacity, which men so enjoy. Expensive, you say? Not at all for the lasting enjoyment derived from such an article. A most capacious oak desk, filled with pigeonholes, drawers and side-alides, can now be parchased for thirty dollars, and far better is it to spend a little more on a useful present than to waste a smaller amount upon something spend a little more on a useful present than to waste a smaller amount upon something utterly useless to a man. Or, if the desk be there, or the purse will not permit, there is perhaps lacking a comfortable rug under the desk, or an easier chair. A revolving bookcase, a dictionary holder or a simple "double-storied" table stand for books and papers, to be placed beside the desk, are luxuries which any man enjoys in his library. For the inside of the desk there are many little things which can be thought of to brighten writing hours, and when they are to be had in silver they are far more acceptable, since silver writing hours, and when they are to be had in silver they are far more acceptable, since silver brightens by its ornamentation, and is lasting as well in its usefulness. A silver pen tray or pen rack, a paper weight, a letter opener, a paper cutter, a mucilage stand and brush, a letter or bill clip, an inkstand, a memorandum tablet, a penholder, a hand blotter, a match box or stamp box, a library ash receiver, an ink eraser, a pincushion or holder, an engagement tablet—all these are little adjuncts any one of which is appreciated by a man much at the desk in his home. Do not choose the elaborate. Men are fond of simplicity about their things, and especially when it concerns their working tools. I have known men to receive as gifts some of the things I have mentioned but of such a farcy character that they refrained from putting them on their desks. A man's desk should be masculine, and its belongings should never suggest the more fancy things to should never suggest the more fancy things to be found on women's secretaries. Whatever be found on women's secretaries. Whatever you buy for a man's desk get of good quality, but of simple design. Look for the serviceable qualities. A man soon tires of a fancy inkstand to which there is more ornamentation than there is depth of ink well.

WHERE a man travels considerably the chances for giving him a serviceable Christmas remembrance are many. The money that is spent on a good traveling bag, casy to handle and open, is never wasted. To a man much "on the road" it is a constant source of comfort, and your thoughtfulness will often be remembered, particularly if the bag be one of those traveling cases into which, in a compact space, all the essentials for a bag be one of those traveling cases into which, in a compact space, all the essentials for a man's dressing are included. Travelers shaving cases; comb and brush cases; collapsion cups; silver pocket foot-rules; silver combination memorandum, card and postage stamp cases; silver key-clasins or rings—all these are things which enter into the daily comfort of a traveling man, and offer a constant reminder of the giver.

If a man smokes, do not give him cigars or tobacco unless you know for a certainty the particular brand he prefers. Men are very fidgety about this, and they have their decided likes and dislikes. Give him rather one of those latest cedar-lined cigar boxes which will keep his cigars from getting too dry for good smaking. Or a silver cigar enter; an ash receiver; a tobacco jar; a smoking jacket; a match or fusee box; a cigar or cigarette case for pocket or table; a cigar case or stand; a cigar lighter; the latest "pipe companion," combinlighter; the latest "pipe companion," combin-ing scraping spoon, tobacco press and cleaning point, or something of a nature that will help in the enjoyment of his evening cigar or pipe. Men get an astonishing amount of com-fort from the cigar or pipe, and they are very quick to appreciate anything which enters into that most "delicious moment" of their lives when the after-dinner cigar is lighted and they are at their ease.

But do not get too close to the smoking ar-ticle itself, unless you take some male friend into your confidence, and then it is well to feel certain that the friend is one who is thoroughly conversant with the taste of your father, husband or brother. Many a woman father, husband or brother. Many a woman has bought a meerschaum pipe, cigar or cigarctic holder only to find it seldom used after presentation. A friend of mine only recently purchased for her husband a very delicate amber cigarette holder. It was a dainty, costly little article, but so small was the opening of the holder that it was absolutely impossible to insert within it the most compact Turkish eigarette. Of course, it was useless. Women had far better confine themselves, in presents, to the belongings of a smoker rather presents, to the belongings of a smoker rather than to try and please with the smoking ma-

THE dressing room of a man is another place in the house which easily lends itself to welcome Christmas presents. Of I place in the house which easily lends itself to welcome Christmas presents. Of course, here everything depends upon the extent of the man's fondness for dress. With the room of a fop, or one of our modern "dudes," my ignorance is so dense that I shall not try to enter into the spirit of its belongings. I should think anything might belong to it; particularly anything of a far-fetched or ugly nature, or something which offends refined taste. But the average American man dresses neatly, and he is fond of having things in his dressing room which will give him the most comfort in arranging his give him the most comfort in arranging his toilet. As a rule, men dress in haste, and hence the idea of meeting their wants for a quick toilet should be most borne in mind.

Nine men out of every ten have an aversion for shaving, but for precautionary or economical reasons many prefer to shave themselves, and here is where gift-making is appreciated. The essier you can make it for a man to shave himself, the warmer he will respond to a gift. "Now, there is a sensible present," said a husband who had been for a whole year regularly cutting himself agars, proming with a dell cutting himself every morning with a dull instrument, when his wife, on Christmas Day, presented him with a set of razors. And the pleasure which that man now finds in shaving himself is something positively delightful to see. Some men prefer sets of two, three, or seven razors, where others, and many men, use only a single razor. In conjunction with this comes a complete shaving stand, a simple portable shaving glass with ring handle, a diver-ringed strop, a shaving cop or a brush, a set of shaving towels for bathing the face after shaving, a shaving soap case, a shaving powder puff case, or any of the little things so necessary to a complete shaving outfit.

0 THE belongings of the average man's dressing case are not many, and hence is the reason stronger that what is given should be selected with a due regard of what he already possesses. For the interior, cuff and collar boxes, stud and button trays, bow-tie receptacles, four-in-hand scarf boxes, made-up scarf "files" and glove boxes are the most important things. The latter items depend upon the kind of neckwear the man most wears. For ant things. The latter items depend upon the kind of neckwear the man most wears. For outside the dressing case, there is a pair of "military" hair-brushes, silver-backed; a silver-edged moustache comb for chiffonier and whiteer brush; silver-backed hat or ver-edged monstache comb for chinomer and pocket; whisker brush; silver-backed hat or cloth brush; a glovestretcher; a toothbrush case with powder box combined; shoe buttomer and horn; nall filer; patent leather shoe felt brush, and other things.

Away from the dressing case itself, a man's room offers just as many chances for adding to his comfort as does the room of a woman.

Many men have no senarate dressing room.

Many men have no separate dressing room, and where that apartment is embodied in their sleeping room and sitting room, as par-ticularly is the case of young men who live in ticularly is the case of young men who live in boarding houses, a woman can find no better place for delicate and thoughtful presents. The surroundings of the average young man in a boarding house are, the good Lord knows, forlorn enough at their best, and to study to supply such a young man's lack of comforts constitutes in spirit and in deed true Christ-mas giving. If there is one class we can pro-fitably remember at Christmas-tide with some thoughtful, comforting gift, it should be the young men of our acquaintance whose lines young men of our acquaintance whose lines in life necessitate them to eke out a doleful existence in one of our modern boarding houses. If there is anything that could be more perfectly doleful to me than a Chi-nese funeral, I think it is Christmas in a boarding house.

A ND while on this general subject of Christmas giving as far as it appertains to gifts for men's dress and dressing rooms, let me say what I think are two timely things. The first is, to those women who are in the habit of presenting their husbands, brothers or male friends at Christmas time with neckwear. Let me suggest to you to choose some other form of present. As a rule, men infin-itely prefer to buy their own scarfs, since each man has his own particular funcies in that direction. For a woman to select a man's neckwear amounts to about the same thing neckwear amounts to about the same thing as for the average man to select dress-goods for a woman. Ten to one he would choose precisely what his wife would not care to wear, and this is generally the state of affairs when a woman starts out to "cravat" her husband. There are wives who can most acceptably purchase their busbands' neck-wear, but they are mighty few. For the most part, their choice is something lamentable. I have in mind two of my friends who are posihave in mind two of my friends who are posi-tively walking caricatures so far as their neckwear is concerned, whose cravats are chosen by their wives. They are always a year behind the styles—sometimes a little farther back. The happiest thing about these two men is, however that neither is con-scious of it, and I never see them but I think of how perfectly blissful it must be to be ignorant on some points.

The second word is to those young women who are so prone, at Christmas time, to bestow scented handkerchief cases and things of that nature upon young men. My dear young women, let me earnestly entrent you; Do not do it. I recall a young friend of mine who came to me soon after Christmas of last year with an exquisitely-worked mouchoir case. It was a costly article, without doubt, and so scented with sachet that for the next few hours I could smell nothing else in my room. He told me, in confidence, that a "very par-ticular young lady friend" had sent it, and then asked me if I knew what it was for! He said he tried to get his cuffs and collars into it, but they would not stay straight, and it was not long enough for his cravats! And I know of other cases where suchet glove-cases and trinket bags were sent at Christmas to young men who have not yet discovered the true uses for which they were intended.

In the brief space allowed me I cannot, of course, mention all the most acceptable presents for men. There are innumerable articles, such as umbrellas, gloves, handkerchiefs, sleeve, cuff or collar buttons; scarfpins, although these latter are a trifle dangerous unless one is thoroughly conversant with a man's taste; a black or brown alligator leather pocket memoranda case; a traveling case for an evening suit; a watch-chain locket; case for an evening suit; a watch-chain locket; an easy dining-room arm-chair; a gold pencil; a necktie clasp—these naturally suggest themselves. In fact, this whole matter of presents for men resolves itself into the suggestion given at the commencement of these remarks; Appeal to the practical side of a man in your gift-making to him. Study his comfort, and see by what little token you can add to it. Do not reflect his tastes by your own. Just as men and women are differently constituted, so do their tastes vary from those of the opposite sex. The plate of Dresden or Royal Worcester ware over which a woman would delight, might strike no responsive chord in a man's nature.

THAVE heard it said that men do not appreciate presents, and that they take far more pleasure in giving on Christmas than in receiving. Commendable as is this spirit which is credited to men, it is not altogether so. That men take pleasure in bestowing gitts is true, but they are just as appreciative of presents bestowed. Men by their very natures lack the spontaneous effusiveness of women in the reception of their gifts, but it does not therefore follow that their appreciation of them is less. Men are trained to a matter-of-fact way in the outer world which they frequently carry into their domestic or social lives, and they content themselves with a simple "Thank you" in the acknowledgment of a gift where women might be more effusive and dilate upon the beauties or possibilities in a gift. Not on the beauties or possibilities in a gift. Not so with the man. He takes in the usefulness of a present the moment he sees it in a single glance, and as a rule he feels far more than be giance, and as a rule he recis for more than he says. But a man's memory is very retentive of every kindness and thoughtful courtesy shown him, and he is slow to forget the heart which prompted the attention, or the hand which bestowed it. A woman never has a sweeter significance to a man as when she comes before him in the character of Consider-ation.

A S a people, I think we are in great danger of running this matter of Christmas presents into the ground. American-like, we are going to overdo it. We are getting possessed of the notion that presents must be costly in order to be appreciated, and where Christmas giving was once a pleasure, some of us make positively hard work of it, and strain our purses far beyond their capacity. Years ago such a precaution toward extravagance in our gifts was unnecessary—to-day it is. How often do we hear people say: "I always give more than I receive," as if what was once a beautiful custom was being placed on a commercial basis. If we allow ourselves to be dragged much farther into the present drift of extravagance in the matter of gift making, we shall live to see the custom of Christmas presents fall into disuse just as the delightful practice of New Year calling has, by its abuse, been forced out of custom. The great family life of this country represents comfort but not plenty. It can live well but not extravagantly. It represents better than does the family life of any other nation the beautiful ties which hind home and friends together, and it delights in nothing so much as to show by little acts of kindness and remembrance its valuation of that union. But if recognition of social intercourse is to be messured by nonetary values, we shall soon see a dissolution which will neither help our houses nor the existing bonds of domestic friendship and neighborly communion. The beauty of a gift, whether at Christmas-tide, wedding, hirthday or any anniversary or celebration, should be in the spirit in which that token comes to us, and not by its commercial value. Hundreds of us cherish the wish to remember our friends at Christmas with some little token of our faith in them, and we can do so, and go on doing so year after year if we shall not expect more from our friends. little token of our faith in them, and we can do so, and go on doing so year after year if we shall not expect more from our friends than a mere remembrance of the day.

W OMEN undoubtedly constitute by far the great majority of present buyers, and hence it is that I have sought to interpo-late the preceding paragraph in this article. Men have a way, at Christmas time, of leaving the matter of gifts to their wives and the women of their household. And hence it is that this matter, as do so many other vital questions appertaining to our future welfare and happiness as a people comes home with a direct appeal to women for its remedy. It is for women to decide whether we shall retain the old-time simplicity of Christmas giving, or whether the practice will find its own death in the incapacity of thousands who will find themselves tinable to cope with the standard raised. Let us be generous, but do not let us overdo it. Let us remember at Christmas-tide all who have shown us kindnesses or considerall who have shown us kindnesses or consider-ation during the year past. Let us sit quietly and think into what humble place we can send a white-winged messenger of Christmas cheer or remembrance. Let us not forget those hun-dreds of homes in which Christmas is only a name to indicate a day. Let us think of every one we can, for nothing is so beautifully sym-bolical of friendship and love as a token of remembrance on Christmas Day. But let remembrance on Christmas Day. But let those tokens be measured by love, and not by cold and hard values. Let us have one thing in our American life apart from monetary consideration, and of which we can truthfully say: This I do in love because my love is yours; this I do in friendship because I am your friend; this I do in remembrance of another as God has remembered me.

ERHAPS I cannot do better this month than to select from the many letters from Jour-NAL readers which awaited my return from Europe, and give answer to a few where the questions propounded are of sufficient general in-terest for answer in print. A brother minister in the

A brother minister in the West writes to ask whether that which he "absorbs from books" and "puts into his sermons" is really theft." I should think much would depend upon what he "absorbs; "some men "absorb" so much from other people's ideas that they have not room left in their minds for any of their own. But this fellow workerasks: "Do you believe that plagiarism is equivalent to theft?" In other words, my brother in the Gospei wants to know whether it is right for a clergyman to sten!?

MAY A MINISTER STEAL?

FRIEND of mine once asked me: If a A minister can find a sermon better than any one be can make, why not preach it? If any one he can make, why not preach it? If an author can find a paragraph for his book better than any he can himself manufacture, why not appropriate it? That sounded well. But I said to him: Why not go farther and ask, if a woman find a set of furs better than she has in her wardrobe, why not take them? If a man find that his neighbor has a full Alderney cow, while he has in his own yard only a scrawny runt, why not drive boons the only a scrawny runt, why not drive home the Alderney? Theft is taking anything that does Alderney? Theft is taking anything that does not belong to you, whether it be sheep, oxen, hats, coats or literary manerial.

Without attempting to point out the line that divides the lawful appropriation of another's ideas from the appropriation of another's phraseology, I have only to say that a literary man always knows when he is stealing. Whether found out or not, the process is belittling, and a man is through it blasted for this world, and damaged for the next one. The ass in the fable wanted to die because he was besten so much, but after death they changed his hide into a drumhead and thus he was his hide into a drumhead and thus he was besten more than ever. So the plagfarist is so vile a cheat that there is not much chance for him, living or dead.

LITERARY FELONY IN THE PULPIT

LITERARY FELONY IN THE PULPIT

WHAT every minister needs is a fresh nosssage that day from the Lord. I would sell cheap all my parchments of licensure to preach. God gives his ministers a license every Sabbath and a new message. He sends none of us out so mentally poor that we have nothing to furnish but a cold hash of other people's sermons. Our haystack is large enough for all the sheep that come round it, and there is no need of our taking a single forkful from any other barrack. By all means use all the books you can get at, but devour them, chew them line and digest them, until they become a part of the blood and bone of your own nature. There is no harm in delivering an oration or seemon belonging to some one cise provided you so announce it. Quotation marks are cheap, and let us not be afraid to use them. Do you know why quotation marks are made up of four commas, two at the head of the paragraph adopted and two at the head of the paragruph adopted and two at the close of it? Those four commas mean that you should stop four times before you steal anything.

that you should stop four times before you steal anything.

If there were no question of morals involved, plagiarism is nevertheless most perilous. There are a great many constables out for the arrest of literary defrauders. The stolen paragraph that you think will never be recognised has been committed to memory by that old lady with green poggles in the front pew. The very same brilliant passage you have just pronounced was delivered by the clergyman who preached in that pulpit the Sabbath before: two thieres met in one hen-roost. All we know of Doctor Hayward, of Queen Elizabeth's time, is that he purloined from Tacitus. Be dishonest once in this respect, and when you do really say something original and good, the world will cry out: "Yes, very fine! I always did like Joseph Addison!"

Sermons are successful not according to the head involved in them, but according to the heart implied, and no one can feel aright while preaching a literary dishonesty. Let us be content to wear our own coat though the map on it is not quite as well looking, to ride white preaching a literary disnotiesty. Let us be content to wear our own coat though the nap on it is not quite as well looking, to ride on our own horse though he do not gallop as gracefully, and will "break up "when others are passing. There is a work for us all to do, and God gives us just the best tools to do it. What folly to be hankering after our neighbor's chalk-line and gimlet!

While personally I have suffered much at times from literary felony, I have never, I look, cherished hard feelings for those who appropriated my works and used them as their own. I have rather, I think, felt sympathy for them. For, with such a beautiful dispel to preach, such a message of bewildering grandeur to impart, such visions of heavenly glory to depict, I cannot understand how a man can do aught than preach from his heart. And where there is such a man who lacks the heart to preach that gospel, my tears are far more ready for him than my censure.

A CURE FOR THE BLUES

WOMAN from one of Canada's most

A WOMAN from one of Canada's most beautiful cities, living in a home of elegance and refinentent, as shetells me, writes: "I try to be cheerful and happy, but somehow or other I cannot overcome constant spells of the 'blues." What can I do?"

Now almost every nature, however sprightly, sometimes will drop into a minor key or a subdued mood that, in common parlance, is recognized as "the blues." There may be no adverse causes at work, but somehow the bells of the soul ston ringing, and you feel like sitadverse causes at work, but somebow the bells of the soul stop ringing, and you feel like sitting quiet, and you strike off fifty per cent, from all your worldly and spiritual prospects. In such depressed state no one can afford to sit for an bour. First of all, my sister, when "the blues" seize you, get up and go out of doors. Fresh air, and the faces of cheerful men, and pleasant women, and froliceome children will in filese minutes kill mention. The dren, will, in fifteen minutes, kill moping. The first moment your friend strikes the key-board of your soul it will ring music. A hen might as well try on populous Broadway to batch out a feathery group as for a man to successfully brood over his ills in lively society. Do not go for relief among those who feel as badly as you do. Let not toothache, and rhenmatism as you do. Let not toothacke, and rhemmatism and malaria. On one block in Brooklyn live a doctor, an undertaker and a clergyman. That is not the row for a nervous man to walk on, lest be soon need all three. Throw back all the shutters of your soal, and let the sunlight of genial faces shine in. Besides that, why should any woman sit with the blues? Shone upon by such stars as dot the Canadian sky, and breathed on by such air, and sung to by and oreacted on by such air, and saing to by so many pleasant sounds, you ought not to be seen moping. Especially if light from the better world strikes its aurora through your night-sky ought you be cheerful. You can afford to have a rough luncheon by the way if it is soon to end amid the banqueters in white. Sailing toward work blands white. Sailing toward such a blessed port, let us not have our flag at half-mast. Leave to those who take too much wine "the gloomy rayen tapping at the chamber door," but as for you and I give us the robin red-breast and the chaffinch. Let some one with a strong voice give out the long-metre doxology, and the whole world "praise God from whom all blessings flow." blessings flow."

WHEN THINGS GO WRONG

OF course there are undoubtedly times when everything seems to go wrong.

From seven o'clock A. M. until ten P. M. affairs are in a twist. You rise in the morning, and the room is cold, the steak for breakfast is tough, the stove smokes, the pipes have ing, and the room is cold, the steak for breakfast is tough, the stove smokes, the pipes have burst, and you start for your marketing nettled from head to foot. All day long things are adverse. Insimuations, petty losses, meanness on the part of everybody. The ink-bottle apsets and spoils the carpet. Some one gives a wrong turn to the damper, and the gas escapes.
Besides this, you have a cold in your head, and a grain of dirt in your eye, and you are a walking uneasiness. The day is out of joint, and no surgeon can set it. Now, the probability is that if you would look at the weather vane you would find that the wind is north-east, and you might remember that you have lost much sleep lately. It might happen to be that you are out of joint instead of the day.
Be careful, and not write many letters while you are in that irritated mood. You will pen aome things that you will be sorry for afterward. Let us remember that these spiked nettles of life are part of our discipline. Life would get neasseating if it were all honey.
That table would be poorly set that had on it nothing but treacle. We need a little vinegar, mustard, pepper, and horse-radish to bring the learn even when we do not feel pathetic. mustard, pepper, and horse-radish to bring the lears even when we do not feel pathetic. If this world were all smoothness, we would never be ready for emigration to a higher and better world. Blustering March and weeping April prepare us for shining May. This world is a poor hitching post. Instead of tying fast on the cold mountains, we had better whip and hasten on toward the warm inn where our good friends are looking out of the window watching to see us come up.

DRAWING UP YOUR OWN WILL

ONE good woman, with an economical turn O of mind, and yet with an eye to the future comforts of those whom she will leave behind her, asks whether a will drawn up by berself will hold good in the eyes of the law. She has a good law volume to follow as to the proper formula.

Books setting forth legal forms are no doubt valuable. It should be a part of every young woman's education to know something of these. We cannot for the small business transthese. We cannot for the small business trans-actions of life he constantly hunting up the "attorney-at-law" or the village squire. But comony in the transfer of property, or in the making of wills, is sometimes a permanent disaster. There are so many quirks in the law, so many hiding-places for scamps, so many modes of twisting phrase-dogy, so many decisions, precedents and rulings, so many John Does who have bruncht suits against John Does who have brought suits against Richard Roes, that you had better in all important business matters seek out an honest lawyer. And there are as many honest men in the legal profession as in any other. Do not get possessed of the foolish notion that all lawyers are dishonest. They are not, Some of the best Christian men I know plead before the bar of justice. You can find plenty of honest lawyers if you really need them: and in matters involving large interests you had in matters involving large interests you had better employ one.

As to the making of one's own "last will and testament." I would say: Avoid it unless you have great legal skillfulness. Better leave no will at all than one inefficiently constructed. The Orphans' Court could tell toany a tragedy of property distributed adverse to the intention of the testator. You save twenty to a hundred dollars from your commet by writing your own will, and your heirs pay ten thousand dollars to lawyers in disputes over it. Perhaps those whom you have wished especially to favor will get the least of your estate, and a relative against whom you always estate, and a relative against whom you always had especial dislike will get the most, and your charities will be apportioned differently from what you anticipated—a hundred dollars to the Bible society, and three thousand to the "hook and ladder company."

ARE OUT-DOOR SPORTS DEMORALIZING?

THERE is a splendid letter from a young I man who loves out-door sports, but his parents object to his includence because they believe that the present tendency toward sport-ing in young men is demoralizing, and he asks whether his parents are right.

There is just now an attempt at the glorifica-tion of muscle. The man who can row the swiftest, or can knock a ball the farthest, or drop the strongest wrestler, is coming to be of more and more importance. The ball player more and more importance. The ball player is the hero of the hour during the summer, as is the "crack" stroke-one. Recently we have had a manese of pugilism. Strong muscle is a grand thing to have, but if Sampson finds nothing more useful to do than carrying off gate-posts, hisstrong muscle is only a nuisance. Out-door sports develop the muscle, and that is what every young man should have, but everything depends on the extent he goes into sports, and how he uses the nuisale. By all nosurs I would advise any young man to entitivate physical energy. Let there be more gymnasiums in our colleges and the ological seminaries. Let the student know how to wield our and but, and in good boyish wrestle ological seminaries. Let the student know how to wield our and bat, and in good boyish wrestle see who is the strongest. The health of mental and spiritual work often depends on physical health. If I were not opposed to betting, I would lay a wager that I can tell from the book column in any of the newspapers or magazines of the land the condition of each critic's liver and spleen at the time of writing. A very roomingnet literary man apploping to critic's liver and spiece at the time of writing.

A very prominent literary man apologized to me not long ago for his merciless attack on one of my books, saying that he felt miserable that morning and must pitch into something, and my book being the first one on the table, he pitched into that. Our health decides our style of work. If this world is to be taken for God, we want more amerified muscle. The man who comes to his Christian work laying man who comes to his Christian work having had sound sleep the night before, and the result of reast beef, rare, in his organism, can do almost anything.

But while I advocate all sports, and exercises, and modes of life that improve the physical organism, I have no respect for bone, and nerve, and musclein the abstract. Health and nerve, and musclein the abstract. Health is a fine barp, but I want to know what tune you are going to play on it. I have not one daisy to put on the grave of a dead pugilist or mere boat-racer or base-ball player, but all the garlands I can twist for the tomb of the man who serves God, though he be as physically work as Eighard Bowten who are illustrated. weak as Richard Baxter, whose ailments were almost as many as his books.

PROLIXITY IN RELIGIOUS SERVICE

GOOD Presbyterian elder complains of A. the prolixity of the religious services in his church, and says it is driving the young people away. "How long," he asks, "do you believe ought a religious service continue?" The question falls into the discussion now raging in some of the papers as to how long or short sermons and prayers ought to be. Some say a discourse ought to last thirty minutes, and others forty, and others an hour, and prayers should be three minutes long, or five or fifteen. Now, you might just as well discuss how long a frock coat ought to be, or how many ounces of food a man ought to eat. In the one case, everything depends upon the man's size; in the other, everything on the capacity of his stomach. A sermon or a prayer ought to go on as long as it is of any profit, If it is doing no good, the servion is half an hour too long, though it take only thirty minutes. If the audience cough, or fidget, or minutes. If the audience cough, or fishet, or shuffle their feet, you had better stop praying. There is no excuse for a man's talking or praying too long if he have good eyesight and hearing. But suppose a man have hissermon written and before him. You say he must go through with it? Oh, no. Let him skip a few leaves. Better sacrifice three or four sheets of sermon paper than sacrifice the interest of your bearers. But it is a silly thing for a man in a prayer-meeting or pulpit to stop merely because a certain number of minutes have expired while the interest is deepening—absurd pired while the interest is deepening—absurd as a hunter on track of a rochuck, and within two minutes of bringing down its antiers, stopping because his wife said that at six o'clock precisely he must be home to supper.

Keep on hunting until ammunition gives out. Still, I must admit that the danger is on the side of prolixity. The most interesting prayers we ever hear are by new converts who say we ever hear are by hew converts who say everthing they have to say and break down in one mhaute. There are men who, from the way they begin their supplications, indicate a long stege. They first pray you into a good frame, and then pray you out. They take literally what Paul meant to be figurative: "Pray without censing."

HEART TO HEART TALKS

HIS month always seems to me to be the most uninteresting month of the year. It is neither one thing northeother. It is not winter, and yet it often feels like it. It is not the beautiful autumn, the benutiful antumn, though you may have a few days that will make you think of the days that have passed. I wonder if there are not November Christians? One does not like to say they are not Christians, for there is good in them, and if there is only a little love—"love is of God;" but they often strike you just as the raw chilly day in November strikes you. Now, maybe, there is more of the November in us all, at times, than we would like to confess. You know there are days and hours when you feel like June. Are there not hours, maybe days, when you feel like November?

feel like November? Now, in this November number of the Now, in this November number of the Jounnal I want to tell you, and tell my Circle especially, that never was it clearer to me than now, that while it may be November in nature, and November in God's Providence, while your outward life may be a sort of November, and the chilly natures may be around you, in spite of all, in spite of everything, it may be June in your soul all the time. The birds will sing, the "green pastures" will be yours, and the "still waters," and "No storm can reach your inmost calm." If your King (for He is King of Souls) cannot do this and reign over your souls, if he cannot bring every thought into aweet subjection to His will, then there must be some one stronger than our King. You would not like to think your evil nature is stronger than He, would you? You would not like to think any power is stronger than His, would you? Then why is it that so few know anything about perpetual summer in the soul? Do you not think it is because they have never believed there is any such inner life for them?

THE CRISIS OF THE SOUL

NOW, suppose this month of November, 1892, you decide that you will know the inner life of which I am speaking. Take your thought away from all your outward life, whatever your life may be, and say to yourself: "If I cannot have an ontward paradise, I will have an inward paradise, It was pride and envy and robelilon against circumstance that gave me the November experience; now, if I can have June instead, I will have it."

Just here the crisis will take place. Do you know what a serious word that is? Did you ever watch one passing the crisis of a fever? The doctor has said that the sleep the sick one has fallen into will probably determine whether the patient will live or die. Every step in the room is a light step. Oh, how the loved ones watch, and when the invalid opens her eyes you see the delirium is passed. She will live! She has passed the crisis. Now, these crises come in soul life, and sometimes in the way of health, and sometimes in the other way of health, and sometimes in the in the way of health, and sometimes in the other way—the way of death. When a soul gets where it says: "I will be-live there is a better inner life in the Christian life than I am living, and if there is, why should I not have it?" that soul is approach-ing a crisis in its soul history. It is very seri-ous. Many come up to this point, and a kind of vision of this life of inward harmony with God comes to them, or, in the language of a hymn I have known from childhood, they see the beauty of

"A heart in every thought renewed, Betteving, true and clean, Which neither life nor death can part From Him that dwells within,"

Now, I tell you you will come out on one side or the other of this inner life. You must say, "I will have such a heart. I will have all God's will done in me. I will be rich in my soul, God's will done in me. I will be rich in my soul, if I am poor in my outward circumstances. I will be rich in a friendship of soul with my King, no matter what I may have missed in the human. Such an experience I will have!" If you say this, the crisis is past and you are on the road to perfect health. You may not have all the strength in a moment, but you will have it. Or you may sigh and say: "Yes, it looks very lovely; maybe some have such a happy inner life, but I do not think it is for me. I know how impulsive I am, and I do not think I could ever live such a life. It is too high for me. It looks too much like being perfect, and I am sure I could never be perfect." Ob, my sister, wait a moment. Do you remember in the life of Christ when he said some things to his disciples that they did not understand? We read, "From that time many of His disciples went back, and walked no more with Him." Oh, what they missed.

BREAKING THE RECORD

Now, I want you at this time to say: "I will be honest and sincere. If there is a better inner life for me, I will not be so foolish as to lose it by being prejudiced, or by thinking it cannot be." You do not see such a spirit along any other life of progress. Almost every steamer that crosses the Atlantic is trying to break a past record and go quicker. Shall all this be on other lines than the spiritual? A few months ago the steamer City of Chicago went to pieces, and, mind you, she was not one of the fastest steamers. I crossed the ocean in her more than once, and as the City of Paris or City of New York passed us, I heard people on board our vessel say they would rather go on aslow steamer. Well, her slowness did not save her at the last, I notice, and your slowness in this spiritual voyage is not going to save you. What you need is to break your record! I am not pleading for greyhounds on the sea, but I am pleading for greyhounds on the sea, but I am pleading for the fastest spiritual steamers on this spiritual ocean we are on, and I do not care for earthly records, but I do care "for the record on high," and I ask every member of my Circle to break her record; and from this time to say: "By the grace of God I will be what He made me to be, and He made me to live in me, so that I might enjoy Him forever, and that is the life I will have."

THE TWO LISTS

THE TWO LISTS

DID you ever notice that St. Paul made out two lists, and said he proved his ministry by both? Look at it closely sometime—"honor" and "dishonor," "evil report" and "good report." It is very wonderful, if you will look deeply enough into it; the only way to become well known is to be unknown; the only way to make others rich is to become poor, and I want you to mark this in your own history. If some one honors you it will be almost certain that not long after some one will slight you. Well, there it is —"honor" and "dishonor." Just as you are thinking what a good report such an one has given of you, the evil report is on its way to you. I call this ballast. God must keep His ships steady, so He sees to the ballast. Take the thorns with the roses; wear them both. Say to yourself: "Why should I not be slighted in some directions? I am made much of in other quarters." And do rejoice in the good that is being done, no matter who does it. One of my favorite every-day verses is that of Whittier. my favorite every-day verses is that of Whit-

"What matter mine or another's day, So the right word be said, And life the sweeter made!"

and forever keep the thought with you that your happiness must come from your giving instead of receiving. But you say "there is just where my trouble comes. I want to give, and I am shut out from giving." Never! You are never where you cannot say: "I give my patient God my patient heart." And is it nothing to give to God? Is it nothing for Him to receive? Him to receive?

GOD'S TREATMENT I AM writing this in an institution where the word "treatment" is the word most frequently used from day to day. The physician makes out what we call our treatment: at a certain hour a bath, another time a rub, etc. At the hoar we go or it comes to us,
"our treatment," and it is so pleasant to bear on one side and another: "I have improved wonderfully under the treatment: I weigh so many pounds more than when I estne." We take the treatment. Are we as wise on spirit-ual lines? Do we not rebel against the treatnal lines? Do we not rebel against the treat-ment, the appointed tasks or the appointed crosses? We do not take the "rubs" and say "this will help me." I think God arranges for the cure of pride and envy and all the dis-cases we must be cured of, but we do not like the treatment. Suppose the patients here should say: "I do not like to take a bath, I do not like the massage treatment." Well, you can refuse to take the treatment, but you do say at your own cost. so at your own cost.

Now, suppose you try for one day to take all that comes to you as God's "treatment," and when, as you sometimes say, "I do not know why I should be treated so unkindly," just take it as something that is for your good. But it is injustice, you say. It is not right. Never you mind; take it in the spirit of Jesus Christ, who when He was reviled, reviled not again; when He suffered He threatened not, but committed Himself to Him that judgeth righteously. That is taking treatment from righteously. That is taking treatment from God's hands.

God's hands.

Ah, when the spirit is right nothing can harm us. One near to me has been dizzy for a day or two, and when I would say: "How are you?" the answer would be, "I am all right; the trouble is with the room, it will go round and round." Ah, no; the trouble was in him and not in the room.

THE DEATH OF SELF

THE DEATH OF SELF.

I LOOKED at a lovely young girl yesterday who spoke at the union meeting in the chapel of the Home where I am sojourning.
She said: "We have all had dreams; mine was to go to Japan as a missionary, but my dream was not realized." As I looked at her I felt the absence of self in her. And I said:
"Ah, but He had His dream, and it could only be fulfilled by her not going to Japan." After all, "None of self and all of Him" is the dream—the dream that must be realized. Oh, you struggling women that my heart so goes out dream—the dream that must be realized. Oh, you struggling women that my heart so goes out to! I know there are such hard things to endure. I know your pride is hurt, but you see it is your pride that must die. And it is so hard to die, but it must die. If you would only say: "Strike home, my Futher; kill the dreadful self in me." How often do I think of the words from our ritual, used at my baptism: "Let all that is carnal die in her, and all that is spiritual live and grow in her." Many a time, with the hot tears coursing down my checks, I have said: "Oh, my God, how long since the prayer was offered! Will it ever be answered?" Keep praying!

A LOVELY SUNDAY

A LOVELY SUNDAY

I KNEW I should be "shut in," but my preachers arrived on Saturday night—lilies of the valley—and all the day long they preached to me, and there was no weariness. I did not think the sermon was too long. They said: "We toil not, neither do we spin;" and when I said: "How do you grow?" they did not say bow, they only smiled so sweetly, and looked as if they knew something they could not tell. Then I had music, as well as the sermon, from the lilies of the valley; I listened to the birds, and they excelled Patti. The little meditation I had, I want to give you, who are young and can cultivate whatever you want to grow in you and abound. When I was quite a young girl I saw a piece of poetry that I have never been able to find since, but it made a life-long impression on me. It was an invocation to the spirit of poetry not to leave the poet, and the idea was that if the spirit of poetry left, then the stones would only be stones and the brooks only brooks, etc. And the meaning of the young girl's prayer I understood, and I have prayed that prayer. that prayer.

THE SPIRIT OF ROMANCE

THE SPIRIT OF ROMANCE

I WANTED a romantic life, and I have had it; so of course I have kept my youth, and now in better language than mine let me tell you what I mean by a romantic life.
Canon Kingsley said: "Some say that the Spirit of Romance is dead. The Spirit of Romance will never die as long as there is a man left to see that the world might and can be better barneter wiser, fairer, in all things man left to see that the worst might and can be better, happier, wiser, fairer in all things than it is now. The Spirit of Romance will never die as long as a man has faith in God to believe that the world will actually be better and fairer than it is now—as long as men have faith, however wenk, to believe in the Romance of Romances, in the wonder of all wonders, in that of which poet's dreams have been but childish hints, and dim forebodings even that wonder which our Lord himself has bade us pray for as for our daily bread, and say: 'Father, thy kingdom come, thy will be done on earth as it is done in Heaven.'

one on earth as it is done in Heaven."

I know I falk to you very much about hope, but as I grow older it seems the one thing needful, only it must be hope in God; that anchor holds. Nota dream will go unfulfilled; all that is noble, all that is good, you will have. One of the most helpful thoughts that I have is, that just what I miss now is just what I am to have in the future.

THE TWO PEACOCKS

I HAVE been so interested in two pencocks in our garden. The garden seemed hardly large enough for the long train that one of them carried, and I must confess to a fascinathem carried, and I must confess to a fascina-tion in seeing how the train was managed to appear most graceful; but the other day we had a heavy rain, and the handsomely dressed creatures had to trail their trains in the mud (they could not hold them up), and the sight was anything but pleasant. I found out after-ward that all the intelligence these creatures have seems to be connected with the beauty of their appears. They are simply stupid; they hardly know enough to eat when they are handry, or drink when they are thirsty. hungry, or drink when they are thirsty, and yet they seem never to forget the beauty of their appearance; so when their trains were all muldy they mounted a step-ladder that stood by a tree, and then jumped from the step-ladder into the tree, and the long trains hung down and the rain washed them clean. I was glad enough to see them clean again. One day the landlady had the top of a bureau with a mirror in it set up against the wall. I have seen the peacocks stand for hours looking at themselves in the mirror. and walking before it, and turning their necks to see the beautiful length of their trains. to see the beautiful length of their trains. One of them had a fall the other day. It went up higher and higher into the tree, and at last stepped on a bough too slight and down it came. It was not burt, but seemed mortified. Well, I did learn some lessons from these two pencocks, but I think that I will not give them to you, but I will say this, that I shall never see the train of a gown wiping up the dirt of the street but I shall think "What a pity the bird could not go up into a tree, and the long train be washed clean."

"Perhaps it may turn out a song, Perhaps turn out a sermon."

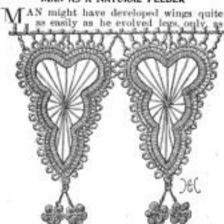

HERE is a beautiful tradition somewhere— if people would leave things alone could put my hands right on it; I have no doubt it has been taken for a cut in the Art Department—but you will recall it when I suggest it, so it doesn't make any difference. You remember that quaint old legend in one of the occult books of the primitive Hindoo mystic, the Ramshackle of Dhwahalagh Ghaggar? I am Hamshackle of Dhwahalagh Ghaggar? I am glad you do, because I have never heard of it myself. The tradition to which I refer is much newer and fresher. I have a deep-rooted distrust of these musty old traditions; it is so hard to establish their identity and veracity when proofs are called for. Therefore, whenever I want a tradition or legend or anything a trifle off historical color, I invent one for the occasion. It fits the case more neatly, and then, if any fault is found with it, I can change it, and keep on changing it to meet change it, and keep on changing it, to meet the strictures of the critics, until the copy-right runs out or I can manage to think of a better one.

THE EVOLUTION OF MAN

THERE is, therefore, a tradition that prehistoric man, being made from the dust of the earth, was wrought, simply and plainly, like unto a haversack. He was built without legs or arms, without brains or conscience.
He was merely a bag with a mouth; a thing to put food into. This is more than a tradition, it is a theory; and this is the very month of the year in which to give it thoughtful consideration and careful study. You see how man grew. In the regular course of time, and by the slow processes of evolution, he developed other faculties and uncreated functions. But they all grew out of his desire for tions. But they all grew out of his desire for food. It has been fully established, by the beautiful theories of evolution, that if you beautiful theories of evolution, that if you desire to possess some organ or faculty that does not exist, and keep on wishing for it, and thinking about it, and trying to get it, by and thinking about it, and trying to get it, by and by you will have it. It is a way the creature has of nagging the Creator into giving it anything it wants. So when, after a while, things quit falling into the ever-open mouth of man, he began to think that if he had any brains he might be able to devise some scheme whereby he might go to his provender, instead of waiting for his food to come to him. In the course of a great many million years—we scientists never talk in small figures—this evolved the perfect dinner bell, with all the concomitants and appurtenances. Thus man, by pertinaciously wishing for them, acquired a few brains, which were stored somewhere in one corner of his stomach. Some of them have remained there ever since. After he got have remained there ever since. After he got his brains, it occurred to him that if he had a his brains, it occurred to him that if he had a neck he could browse around as far as he could reach, anyhow. When he had devoured everything within reach of his limited neck—why he did not develop one as long as a giraffe's belongs to another department of science and will not be discussed here—he began to wish that he could walk a little farther on, and get some more. The effort soon rewarded the hungry creature with a pair of legs, a long section of each one being turned up along the ground, and set apart for the future cultivation of stone bruises, corns, bunions, ingrowing nails, gout and chilblains.

MAN AS A NATURAL FEEDER

pantry and see if there was anything to eat before he went to bed when he came in late. It is, indeed, a most fascinating study, and one of which "us embryologists" never weary—this development of the perfect man. Assuming, of course, that the perfect man, out-side of your own family, has been developed, and all this painstaking investigation, this careful and long-extended observation, convince the investigator that man was, and con-tinues to be, a glutton. It is a painful duty which the conscientious student of his kind has to perform, but the truth is forced upon every observer—man is a natural feeder, a good feeder, and sometimes a better feeder than a provider.

STOMACHIC MORALS

MAN'S very vices and weaknesses grew out of his stomach. Adam's fall was, in a measure, due to his appetite. The devil, who knew man clear through, even as his wife does, tempted him with something to cat, Duty, obligation, happiness and Eden our parents threw away with scarcely a dehate when they were bribed with refreshments. Conscience was smothered in the folds of the stomach. After the expulsion, man coveted his neighbor's cuptoard before he coveted his wealth in mine, or field, or herds. Abraham and Lot, when their substance was so great they scarce could count their flocks, quarreled and Lot, when their substance was so great they scarce could count their flocks, quarreled to the fighting point over pasturage, because the sheep could eat the grass, and they could eat the sheep. Satan's first temptation laid before the Saviour in the wilderness, was the suggestion to His hunger: "Command these stones that they be made bread." Possibly his thought was going back four thousand suggestion to His hunger: "Command these stones that they be made brend." Possibly his thought was going back four thousand years when he threw the first Adam so easily with a handful of fruit. Greedy, shrewd, observant Satun. Millions of banquets has he attended; and after a careful study of man, with a thousand temptations at his command, he has fallen into the habit of ordering up "the old guard" for the first charge, if not, indeed, for the preliminary skirmish. When he fails to knock a man out by a blow aimed fairly at his stomach, his brimstone majesty is always a little puzzled. He says: "Why, here is a remarkable man; here is an extraordinary man; here is a man who doesn't think of something to eat three times a day."

And he has to scratch his horned head and think a little before making the next assault.

THE WORLD AS A TRUCK-PATCH

WHAT is popularly described in the best circles of two or three counties in this United States—and a banquet with a brass band in the conservatory couldn't induce me to mention them by name—as "a meal's vit-tles," was a colossal temptation that caught Esau by the nose with its savory smell, and all that he had and all that he expected he gladly that he had and all that he expected he gladly gave away for the keen delight of gorging himself until he was torpid, or the pot was empty. Esan was not one-half so mean and cold-blooded as the brother who chiseled him out of his birthright. But he wasn't half the man his brother was, either. You could take Jacob's meanness, and shrewdness, and keenness, his strong-headed, long-headed judgment and self-sish ambition, and refine them, and re-direct them, and purify them, and make of these qualities a man worthy to be a father of nations. But Esau's soul never could rise higher than his stomach. The world was never a garden But Esau's soul never could rise higher than his stomach. The world was never a garden nor a battlefield to him. It was a truck patch. There were places where you could grow lentils; you could dig clams in the mud, that was what the deep and dark blue ocean so caselessly rolled on for; you could pasture sheep here and there; you could raise a power of truck to eat in this fair, fertile world. Even after he had nursed his wrath and petted his vengeance for nearly forty years, he was reconciled to his brother; not from manly and generous motives and impulses, but by the judicious present of a few sheep. Jacob knew his brother. That's the reason he didn't remain with him very long after the reconciliation. He knew Esau would be as angry as ever after the sheep were gone, and he was not mistaken. not mistaken.

HUNGER IN POLITICS

W HAT great events in this world's history have binged upon the hunger of the human race! Hunger inspired the French Revolution. The head of Louis XVI was bitten off. A tax on ten helped to fire the Revolution. The head of Louis Avi was bitten off. A tax on tea helped to fire the American heart, and, potent as the spear-embracing arms of Arnold Winkelreid, "made way for liberty." In our own day "cheap sugar" becomes a most potent rallying cry. Andrew Carnegie drops hundreds of thousands of dollars into good, intellectual soil, as a good man plants trees that shall bear good fruit for of doltars into good, intellectual soil, as a good man plants trees that shall bear good fruit for generations that will bless his memory, while they eat of the bounty of his hands. To-day, thousands of the people to whom he gives free libraries and reading rooms scarce lift their eyes to look at their educational palaces, as eyes to look at their enticational palaces, as they pass by without entering them. Suppose Carnegie had endowed free bakeries and butcher shops? He would be canonized be-fore death. Saint Andrew of Homestead would fore death. Saint Andrew of Homestead would eclipse, in popular esteem, Saint Andrew of Bethsaids. The "gude Duke of Argyle," who only scratched the backs of his grateful countrymen, would be but a valet to this greater Scotchman who would tickle the palates of men. Funny, isn't it? But isn't it also true? Appeal to the stomnch of the world, and it will remember you longest. What a man eats he remembers—especially if it doesn't agree with him, and he is sick for a week afterward. week afterward.

I once knew a man who spread a nice slice of bread and butter and strychnine for the rats, and then went out to see a band go by and forgot his solema promise to his confiding wife that he would be set a band for the wife that he would lay out a lunch for all the rats in the county that night. He came in after awhile, saw the bread and butter on the table, ate it himself, and never forgot it to the day of his death.

VICTUALS AND VALOR

ONE is forcibly reminded of these things by the shrill cries of hunger that so by the shrill cries of hunger that so lately rent the starving air in New Yark and Pennsylvania. It made our hearts ache to hear them. These cries did not come from the striking workmen and their families. Oh, no. They seemed to have enough to ent. They enme from the bearded lips of the brave fellows who sprang from desk and work-bench, put on their uniforms and marched away to Homestead and Buffalo to put down anarchy and restore order. Scarce had they returned in triumph, when the usual and expected howl against the commissariat ascended to heaven. At least, it started in that direction, although it probably didn't get more than half way. But we heard it all over this great republic, We just had to listen. The soldier's voice, that erstwhile awed the howling of the turbulent mob, answering lawless threats with a steady shout of defiance, was tremulous with emotion as it told of suffering at meal time. emotion as it told of suffering at meal time. It was not especially weak; it certainly was not effeminate—it is never the women who growl and sould at the cookery or scant pronot effeminate—it is never the women who grow! and scold at the cookery or scant provision at wash-day dinners, or any other time—it certainly was not unsoldierly. Because these were soldierly men; brave, patient, self-denying. It was simply human. It is not merely a soldier's duty or his privilege, it is his nature to grow! at the commissary. Why, there are those of us who can remember how this cry of poor, scanty rations quivered and moaned like a great deep undertone of patriotism in the long five years' chant of devotion and sacrifice all through the late war. Men would leap from comfortless couches on the cold, wet earth, and go into battle with cheers that added terror to their charge; they would cross bayonets with outnumbering foes; they would march up to the black muzzles of murderous batteries like men on parade; they would snatch victory from the pit of defeat; they would fight like heroes—like demi-gods—every man of them. And then, washing the powder stains from their faces and hands, they would sit down on the field which their matchless valor had made glorious forever, where they had won the immortality of fame, and write letters to the loved ones at home and to their local papers telling how hard and tasteless was the hard tack, how mean the salt pork, how small the ration of coffee, and how they had been without sugar for two days.

IN A WORLD OF STOMACHS

But they were not gods. They were only men. Therefore, when they were bungry they made Rome how! When they had no rations they wanted half rations; when they got half, they wanted whole; when they got half, they wanted 'em better. To grumble at the commissary is a military necessity. The best and bravest soldiers do this. The commissary-general doesn't mind it. He is used to it. He expects it. The government makes account of it in his pay. When Samson had made an end of his battle with the Philistines, in which he slew a thousand of his makes account of it in his pay. When Samson had made an end of his battle with the Phillistines, in which he slew a thousand of his enemies with the jaw-bone of an animal that is warlike only with its heels, he sat down, sang a short paalm of triumph, and then walled because he was thirsty and didn't see a river handy. I think it is generally agreed among military men that the punishment meted out to the late famous Private lams was none too severe for the offense. It is not pleasant, of course, to swing by one's thumbs when one can't let go when one wishes. But there are worse punishments than that. I myself have been flayed so that I had to stand up when I slept. And I have seen people—better people than myself and Private lams put together—bastinadeed on the soles of their feet so that they had to walk on their lands. But suppose Colonel Streator had chained the offending soldler to a rock and kept him without anything to eat all day? A yell of horror and indignation would have swept clear across this continent. Clubs and political societies would have gotten up elaborate dinners and banquets, at which there would have been more corkscrews than spoons, at which to denounce the barbarity of the Pennsylvania Colonel. Such a world of stomachs it is.

BEFORE AND AFTER

FIND yourself on board a railway train that rolls into a dining station two hours be-hind time. Observe the manner and the utter lack of manners with which the hungry hu-man creatures devour the food which the hurrying waiters slam down before them.

Now, follow these same men out on the platform after they have stowed away a course dinner in twenty minutes. What a transformation! The erstwhile greedy man offers cigars to half a dozen strangers. Everybody is pleasant, good-humored, fairly angelic in disposition. True, nine-tenths of them will be in misery in about an hour, but just now the angel of peace and good-will broods over that train ow, follow these same men out on the

Now, we are going to show our national and individual gratitude this month, by direction of the President. We are agrateful people. If you don't believe it, see us eat. Some of us—and these are not men—are so thankful we will not go to church at all on Thanksgiving Day. We will stay home and get dinner for a host of other grateful people. It is the dinner that makes us thankful. Some Thanksgiving Day, just you pitch the dinner over the alley fence about ten minutes before home from church. On second thought, perhaps you had better not wait until they come home. You had better run. And keep on running until you get to the middle of the Great American Desert. And stay there.

VIDENTLY a great many of my girls are going to be married this fall. I hope, however, they will still remain my girls, be-cause youth is distinctively a question of the heart, that neither matrimony nor motherhood will interfere with. The reason I think so many are going to be mar-ried, is because so many have asked me what are the duties of a maid of honor? The maid of honor is, presumably, a sister, or the most intimate friend, of the bride, and next to her intimate friend, of the bride, and next to her she occupies the most important position in the bridal procession. In entering the church, while the bridesmaids walk two by two the maid of honor walks by herself just in front of the bride. At the altar she stands next to the bride, takes charge of her bouquet and fan, helps her off with her glove when the welding ring is to be assumed, and later throws back the bride's veil so that it is away from her face as she leaves the church.

After this, when the procession starts to move, she hands the bride her bouquet and fan and, taking her place directly behind the bride and groom, is escorted down the nisle on the arm of the best man. Then she stands by the bride when she is receiving her congratulations for a little while, but later she simply has as good a time as it is possible for a girt to have.

simply has as good a time as it is possible for a girt to have.

Usually, if the bride is dressed in white, and the bridesmaids in a color, the maid of honor wears one differing from the rest so that she may easily be distinguished. It is a pretty idea, this selection of the girl of whom you are foundest to be nearest to you when you are being married, and if you are like other young married woman you will look into the future and plan out a romance between the maid of married woman you will look into the future and plan out a romance between the maid of honor and the best man. The duties of the maid of honor are not irksome. She ought to be graceful and composed, and if she takes my advice she will practice a little bit before the time for the great occasion. I hope I have told every one of my questioners exactly the duties of the "maid of honor." How fascinating and altogether delightful is that old-time title.

THE OLD, OLD STORY

T comes from all over the land; it is the cry of the girl who has to earn her own liv-L of the girl who has to earn her own living, and who does not like the way in which she has to do it. My heart goes out to her because many times she is young, ambitious and feels that she is not being treated properly. Will she listen to a little bit of a sermon? Few of us do what we want to in this life; the girl who helps at home, who gives a helping hand about with the children, who helps with the dishes, makes up the beds and sweeps the rooms, is just as surely earning her living as the one who plays on the keys of the piano or type-writer, who telegraphs, or who keeps the books in some large establishment. It may not be the work you like; you may feel that you are the round woman in the square hole, but you must learn the great art of life—the adapting yourself to places and people. the adapting yourself to places and people.
You must learn to do your work so well that you will grow fond of it, and I tell you, you surely will.

People who do work in a half-hearted, listless way, produce just the same sort of work, and they need not be surprised if it is pro-nounced worthless by the persons who em-ploy them. To really succeed means not only to do your work well, but to do it with interto do your work well, but to do it with interest, and then you will get to liking it. Be a good, strong, American girl; say to yourself, "I will conquer this feeling of distaste, please God," and, having said that, throw your whole heart and the best of your brains into the work which you have at hand. If by some chance you should have a great genius for painting, or music, or whatever it may be, give the play hours to that, and if the genius is there it will come out, and the opportunity will arise to develop it, but, my dear, so many of us think we are great geniuses when it is of us think we are great geniuses when it is only a little talent we have.

OPPORTUNITIES WILL COME

KEEP your eyes open for opportunities, and if you have any ability the time will come when you can display them. But do not worry, and fret, and fume over your work, do not believe that you were intended for better things; instead, make the best of the situation and go ahead. Encourage in yourself the habit of reading; do not fly from one book to another, but try to familiarize yourself with what is elevating and refining in literature. Good books are the best friends that you can have, and the best use you can make of your spare moments will be to spend them with these safe and silent counselors. Let industry, adaptability and cheerfulness characterize your work, and then somebody will say to you; "Well done, thou good and faithful servant." And the joys prepared for you will be the feeling that you have tried your best, and that you have gotten that best of all things in orders. of all things in return—a word of encourage-

THE SPIRIT OF CRITICISM

THE SPIRIT OF CRITICISM

A LITTLE mirror was once given to me on which was painted, "Be to my faults a little blind, and to my virtues ever kind." I never see those words, though the proverb is an old one, that I do not think what a great deal it means in everyday life. You think you would not say a disagreeable word about your friend for anything, and yet somebody comes up to you and talks about her talents, or her beauty, or her goodness, and, almost unconsciously, you say, "Yes, that is true, but" and then you speak of some minor fault. It is the wicked spirit of criticism rising up in you. I wish that all girls, and when I say all girls I mean girls of all ages, would learn to subdue this, for I cannot but believe that these little fault-findings, these little criticisms of dress, of manner, of mode of speech, or of whatever it may be, only tend to make the mind smaller and the girl herself seem environs. And it grows on one so—one feels so certain after awhile that one is going to see the disagreeable rather than the agreeable side of everything. Notithat one is going to see the disagreeable rather than the agreeable side of everything. Noth-ing human is perfect. Just remember that. Try and think that if you can find faults in Try and think that if you can find faults in your friend, how many more can she find in you. Just run over the list on your own side. Every one of us likes the woman who says pleasant things, and the saying of them really creates the feeling of them; if you keep at it long enough, you will grow to see the very best in everybody, and the faults will be entirely obliterated so far as "u are concerned. I once knew a girl who had the reputation for possessing a bad temper; her dearest friends said of her: "She is a dear girl, but what a quick temper she has." She seemed to regard this as a sort of compliment; she spoke of her quick temper herself, and never realized that she was encouraging it by continually talking quick temper herself, and never realized that she was encouraging it by continually talking about and giving it a semi-kindly criticism. This is only one instance of the encourage-ment of faults, and what you and I want, my dear girl, is the encouragement of virtues. So use my little motto, and see if with its help you cannot put down the little, mean spirit of criticism.

THE RIGHTS OF CHILDREN

THIS is a bit of a talk to my married girls.

God, when he gave you a child, gave to it some rights, and these you are bound to respect. You have no right to refuse to answer your child's question. If you do this it will certainly put that same question to somebody else, and may possibly receive an answer or impression that will have a bad effect on it for life.

You have no right to withhold from your child any innocent pleasure; grief and unhappiness come soon enough, and the play-time of life ought surely to be when one is

You have no right to demand from your child to do, and do, and do for you without any regard to its happiness, nor its hope for the

You have no right to conclude that your child is not an independent being; it should be allowed to think and to reason out, with your assistance, the problems of life, but your assistance should be so sweetly given that it will never seem an impertinence.

You toss your head at this, at the idea of a mother being impertinent to a child, and yet it is possible. A child has a right to its own belongings, to its own thoughts and to its own life, and the jesting at, or making fun of any of these to those about you, or to utter strangers, is an absolute impertinence. The rights of children should be respected as religiously as are the rights of parents. Indeed, I am sometimes tempted to believe that respect their parents than their children. This is not a more children parents respect their children. This is not a very long sermon, but I wish some of my married girls, who write to me about their daughters and sons, would think it over.

WOULD YOU?

I WOULD not buy a very elaborate bat, when I knew it was the only one I was going to get all winter, would you?

I would not wear any soiled finery at my business, or for every day in the house, would

I would not suffer one minute from a shoe or glove that was too tight, would you? I would not forget that "thank you" costs nothing and means a great deal, would you?

I would not try making great resolves—I would make little ones, and would try to keep them, would you?

I would not do courteous things one day and rude ones the next, and make my friends wonder if I were a friend or a foe, would you? I would try to be alone sometimes. I want to say this to my girl friends, if you want to keep the love of anybody, even of your sweet-heart, let there be a time when you are alone; it makes the meeting again all the more delightful, and there is nobody so dear to you who will not appreciate it. So do not fail to give and to take those precious moments of loneliness; and by loneliness, I mean just you and yourself. That's a duplex way of being

WHAT YOU WANT * * TO KNOW * * *

Under this heading I will cheerfully answer each month any question I can, sent me by my girl readers—RUTH ASHMORE.

C. AND M .- It is very rude to eat on the street.

M. R. S.—The old custom of putting a ring in a bride's make no longer exists.

J. B. –The grease spots on your pink slik had better be submitted to a probosional cleaner.

E. J.—The word "drama" is pronounced with a broad "a" and not as if it had "ay" introduced in it.

A. A. A. AND OTHERS-I can give no addresses in this column, and must beg that they are not asked of me. A. V. H.—After-dinner coffee is seldom made at the table, though there would be no impropriety in doing so at a small dinner.

1.—A nun's willing of creamy white, trimmed with ribbons to correspond, would be a suitable evening dress for a girl at school.

STRIA.—In directing the envelope write "Professor James Carliste," and in beginning the letter write "Dear Professor Carliste."

C. S. P.—If you fancy, colored scaling wax, either red or green, may be used on an envelope, though I should give the preference to the red.

WINNEL-It is not necessary to sek a man friend who has escorted you home to come in and pay you a visit. Simply thank him for his kindness.

FRANCE-I regret very much that I cannot give to my French girl the address which she desires, as I do not know the lady to whom she refers.

PENCIL—I do not advise cutting the hair to make it grow; instead, try rubbing vaseline well into the roots and giving it regular and systematic brashing.

PANSY B.—The wearing of the hair over the tips of the ears is considered very artistic, and if it is becoming to you I would advise you to continue wearing it so.

FLORENCE—I do not know that it is necessary for the father and mother of the bridal couple to stand with them and receive the good wishes, but it is customary.

AN OLD SUBSCRINGS—Enciose your husband's and your own card to the newly-married couple who are at such a long distance from you, and with whom your hasband, and not yourself, is acquainted. Dunian—If you have known the young man only a short time, even if he asks you to call him by his first name, do not do it, but instead give him the same re-spectful address that you demand of him.

Dot.Lv—A very dainty trimming for a white elik wedding dress is white children. (2) The wearing of the hair high tends to make one book older, and for that weason I do not recommend it for young girls.

Magnotta—For the skin complaint you mention, it would be most advisable for you to consult a good phy-sician, for then a complete cure could be effected, which would be impossible with various quack medicines.

X. Y. Z.—As your engagement is broken, I should insist on returning the engagement ring, even if the gentleman refuses to receive it; he cannot return it to you when you have sent it to him, which is the proper thing for you to do.

Two School, Graus—Girls of thirteen or fourteen should be taken to and from a child's party by a maid, or a member of the family. (2) It is very poor taste to ad-dress an envelope in any way except the received one, which is straight across.

V. R.—As your face is oval, I would suggest your having a rather short being one that does not extend too far back on your head; then draw your lair back and twist is bossely from side to side, fastening it with shell pins. This will tend to apparently increase the width of your face.

FANNIE R.—To whiten your teeth with them once a week, first with seep and then with powdered charcost, being careful to rule every particle of the charcost of with scapader it has done its duty. (2) Offing the finger nails and having them frequently altended to by a manicure tends to make them grow.

B. C. G.—Care as to your diet, that is, the avoidance of very rich food, or that which is greasy, and considerable exercise, will tend to reduce the objectionable color in your checks. I should advise your builting your face with not water. A good, pain easile, or when you can get it pure, brown window, is desirable for the face.

K. N.—The articles on the care of the bair and of the complexion recently published in the Journal will un-doubtedly help you. To avoid the edgy look which is such a trouble to you during the warm weather, do not eat greecy fixeds, and at night just before you go to bed bathle your face in very hot water in which a little borax has been dissolved.

GRAY HAIR—Even if you are only nineteen years old, I would not advise your using anything on your buir to prevent its turning gray. It is by no means un-usual for the last to turn gray early in life, and, as it tends to give the face rather a young look, it cannot be objected to. So many dres contain stuffs that are dan-gerous that I will not advise their use.

Ivy—A widow in deep mourning has a narrow border of black on her visiting cards. (2) It would be in very lad tasts to centisse an acquaintance made in a business way in a store. (3) There would be no impropriety if for some reason you have not been able to see the friend in the past to let him know by a courteous note that it is now convenient to have him call. (4) I should not advise a bell skirt for a girl of fifteen.

L. H. P.—I cannot tell you how much I sympathine with you, for some one of whom I am very fond had the misfortune to be a cripple. I see no reason why you should keep out of sight, and every reason why you should get any amosement you can which is within your reach and is right. I should think, from the de-scription of your condition, that the study of relegraphy would be destrable, and it is one that will not be affected by your unfortunate condition.

Ny. H.—A. lady does not offer a sent in a public conveyance to a man friend unless he should be III, crippled or very old. (2) In speaking to a young man, address him as "Mr. Brown." In writing to an unmarried woman, commence your letter, "Dear Miss Brown." If it is a bosiness letter, write out "Mhe Mary Brown—Hear Madam." When it becomes necessary to use the second sheet of letter paper, even for a business letter, do not tear off the unused poetion.

A. W.—Even if your letters of introduction do not mention that your desire is to obtain work, it is probably intended that in presenting them you should tell what you wish. That your discussion friends think enough of you in describe you in such a flattering manner does not enecem you, and if you will permit me to say it, I will said that you are books to think that, because you work, you must not go in the best seciety, the best society always being that which is best in manner, in heart and in morals.

An EARNIST BRADER—I do think it in very bad taste for a gentleman to take a buly's arm. (2) If a man friend asks you, when you are the trained asks you, when you are the trained asks you to some place of amesoment with him, he should also ask your houses. (I) The hair is not injured by crimping if it is carefully and properly done. The best wash for the hair is hot mater made scapesarily by a piece of common sup and is which is thrown a few drups of amissonis. Use this to senth the scale and hair and then wash both the roughly with clean water, both mull the last given it is parfectly pure after is use.

Insonance—Olives are put on the table from the beginning of disner and remain there until just before dessert is served, so that they may be cutes at any time, it is the each one in the flagrers by itself; as I have said before, asparagus may be eaten from the fingers, (ii) It is not necessary to ask to be excused at a boarding-house table; when one has firmbod eating to retire quietly is all that is expected, 16 A married woman has " Mrs." on her cards and uses it when she writes in the third person; at other times she signs her first name. The same sule applies to a widner.

THE LATEST NOVELTY IN CROCHET WORK

By Margaret Sims

ROCHET work has always been more or less in favor since its very first introduction many years ago; lately, however, a new impetus has been given to its popularity on account of the charming novelties created by our European sisters, charming not only from a practical but also from an artistic point of view.

The newest Anglo-crochet craze is a striking departure from the conventional methods known to our grandmothers; its adaptability to almost any purpose, added to its undoubted beauty, is its greatest recommendation. The method referred to is suited alike for all kinds method reserved to is suited after for all kinds of furniture trimmings, for dress and mantel garniture, as well as for numerous little fancy articles suitable for gifts.

This movelty has not yet found its way to America, and Tun Lancow Hour Journan has, therefore, the pleasure of presenting this newest style of grochet work to its patrons, with the assurance that steps have been taken to ensure the necessary materials being obtainable in the necessary materials being obtainable in this country. I am ready to help my readers with any necessary information within the scope of this department, but I do venture to hope they will endeavor to put their questions clearly, concisely, separately and as briefly as is consistent with clearness, also enclose a clearly directed stamped envelope, otherwise the answers may be much delayed. I will gladly answer inquiries with regard to prices and suitable material for mould crocheting. The novelty consists in the designs being formed by means of shaped machine-made stiff cardboard moulds blocked so that they stiff cardboard moulds blocked so that they are slightly raised; these moulds are made in great variety as to form, differing in size and thickness to suit their application. The veriest tyre in designing might make up patterns for any special use by fitting in moulds to the desired shape. No very special instruction is needed for crocheting over moulds; they are usually covered by means of a double crochet with a figuration adverted for the wallstitch after the manner adopted for the well-known metal rings of assorted sizes. The manner of finishing this work, however, is quite different, as will be seen by the illustrations.

THE LUSTROUS CROCHET THREADS

THE thread employed is made of linen in lovely artistic shades. It is twisted just like silk, showing such a brilliant lustrues to present all the appearance of rich, crochet silk and this at a comparatively moderate cost, a recommendation, indeed, for, seeing how much material is taken up in covering the consermoulds, slik twist would involve considerable expense. The instrons linen exochet threads come in two sizes. The conract thread corresponds to the thickness of rope silk, while the liner thread is about the same as ordinary crocket silk. Another feature about this work is the introduction of gold thread more or less lavishly. The gold thread is made in sizes to accord with the linen twist, and claims to be lavishly. The gold thread is made in sizes to accord with the linen twist, and claims to be washable and not liable to tarnish.

MOULDS OF DIFFERENT SHAPES AND SIZES

LLUSTRATION No. 1 is fairly representative of the numerous shapes and sizes in which the crochet moulds are made. The largest one at the base measures two inches by one and three-quarters. The breadth of the form is one eighth of an inch. Some of the largest moulds not here shown are as much as half an inch in breadth. These are chiefly in request for valances over window curtains, transoms for valances over window curtains, transoms, lambrequins, or for anything calling for a bold, large pattern. To illustrate my remarks with regard to its being easy to make up patterns, suppose it were desirable to increase the depth of the edging No. 2: A row of trefoils, with the small circle between them just as they are placed side.

small circle between them just as they are placed side-ways on the illustrated sheet of moulds, would form an elegant and suita-ble heading, thus increas-ing the depth by at least two inches. The edging re-ferred to, No. 2, measures three and a half inches when finished, without the tassels. The one form emtassels. The one form em-ployed contains so much in itself that a most charming trimming is easily and quickly made with it. This design seems to be

This design seems to be especially suited for bordering window shades. It could be worked in cream and gold, or in any combination of colors barmonizing with the shade to be ornamented. A sample lies before me in which the months are covered with a before me in which the moulds are covered with a

This row completes the picots. They must be enught together in working as shown in the drawing, which must also be taken for a guide in working the heading; this neast be managed so that it lies quite flat. About 2 ch between each at will serve as a will serve, as a rule, to obtain this result, but sometimes more, less, will be needed, a c-cording to the position of the picots to he connected. The connections are made with d

FOR THE BORDER TASSELS

THE tossels are made with 6 bullion stitches. To form these make 3 ch, join; into each ch work 2 bullion st by passing the thread ten or twelve times around the needle; then insert it into the ch, make a single, then draw the thread through all the overs at once, keeping them in place with the fingers of the left hand.

DECORATION FOR HAND-BAG

ILUSTRATION No. 3 shows a pattern intended for decorating a hand-bag, an appendage now very much in favor. The dimensions for a jaunty bag would be about nine inches wide by eleven inches long when finished, the frill at the top being three inches deep above the runners. The erscheted triumning will be crocheted trimming will be a triffe over five inches deep without the tassels. Each section of the pattern, including a star and ring, measures three inches, so that six stors and rings will cover the required width for both sides of the bag. If desired, this pattern can be worked in silk of two shades of the same color, the darker being used for the rings and tassels. The cen-ters may be put in also with silk, but gold thread is prettier. Except for matching dresses of rich material it is not neces-sary to work the bag with silk. For an ordinary walking dress the linen thread will answer perfectly. Any colors may be employed. For instance, a deep rich bluestar with golden brown rings would form a pleasing contrast; red and black would look well, or russet green and maroon. In order that the work should be sufficiently pliable for this particular purpose, the star is made up of eight sections caught together and attached to the center and connecting rings with very fine cotton after the sections are covered. The moulds are finished by means of a row of d c as before directed, but in this instance the hack of the stitch is intended for the right side. It makes a prettler edge than the chain-like effect of the stitch on the side it is worked. The tassels are crocheted over round moulds with close rows of d c, the front part of the st being taken up each time.

DAINTY NAPKIN RINGS

I LUSTRATION No. 4 is intended for a table napkin ring. It is just as pretty as it is novel. A set of these rings in different colors to identify them with their owners would make a charming gift to the presiding genius of the house, worked by the nimble fingers of the young people. For this pattern

a second row of de is worked into the row that a second row of dc is worked into the row that covers the moulds: they are connected at the sides in working with a couple of a st. Five circles and the signet-shaped center make a medium-sized ring when joined, the moulds each measuring three-quariers of an inch before being covered. The picots look well worked in gold thread to make the fillings. For the picots make *, 1 d c, 4 ch, 1 d c into the d c just quade, miss 1 st of the preceding row, repeat from *, connecting the picots with a slip st in working as shown in the pattern. a slip st in working as shown in the pattern.

is a forcible example of one of the many charm-ing combi-nations of moulds of different shapes and sizes. Unlike the previous patterns, this design is worked in

FRIENDSHIP

BY TOM MASSON

ONE day my bookish zeal led me to look Through the rough pages of a dog's-eared book,

That lay, with many others, on a stand Where musty volumes posed as second hand. A friend, a fellow of the nicest taste, Was with me, and entreated me to haste; Yet, ere he snatched me from the tome I caught From its stained leaves, the kernel of a thought.

That thought I took away, and when night came I mused: "How small is friendship, and how tame!

I've known my friend for years, and yet I wis He never gave me such a thought as this."

Next day, once more I passed the book-stall by, Again the musty volume caught my eye. My friend was not in sight. With furtive joy I took it up as children clutch a toy; And then I saw, half stricken out with age His name engraved upon the title page.

A GIRL'S BEST READING

BY AMELIA LANGAR

GREAT deal has been written on the subject, -What to Read," some writers giving a list of the hundred best books, in their ordinion, and others. best books, in their opinion; and others a collection of evidence from famous men and women as to the books which have notably influenced them. These articles have been general in their application, while the present one is addressed to a particular class the most addressed to a particular class, the most precious class in any land, using the adjective advisedly, "our girls," This wide genus in-cludes many species, and it is somewhat diffi-cult to prescribe a course of reading that will be available, profitable and pleasing, even to the majority of its individuals.

With many girls reading is largely a matter of opportunity; some lack the means of procuring many books, or more frequently still, the time necessary for the mastery or enjoyment of the helpful volume; or, saddest of all, the taste or appreciation of what is beautiful and ennobling in literature is lacking. This is the heaviest boit on the gate of knowledge, for no amount of recommendation can give one enjoyment of a book, and in mental, as in physical, food we are profited only by what we assimilate. But it is just for those who feel both longing and limitation that this article is written; simply to act as a finger-post, indicating in what direction true mental culture may be reached.

Bear in mind that there are passing books rection true mental collure may be reached.

Hear in mind that there are passing books and lasting books, books of the day and books for all time. Help and pleasure are to be found in both, but the manner of reading them will differ. The one kind furnishes comparatively easy reading, because more on the level of our own knowledge and experience; but the latest book, or most excellent magnaine, should not occupy the time to the exclusion of the older authors who, according to Ruskin, often give you their thought more to Ruskin, often give you their thought more by way of reward than of help, just as nature does not apread her gold upon the surface, but lets us search and dig, or crush the rock to get the precious ore. Do some reading that get the precious ore. Do s requires thought and labor.

Furst in our list we place the book which is a library and a liberal education in itself—the Bible. Read it for devotion, that its high, deep and wide thoughts may lift you into fellowship with its Author. Read it for coun-sel as to daily life, for training in wise thought, for the beauty of its language, as well as for the comfort and stimulus it affords. The books which have grown out of the Bible are so numberless and varied that there is little so numberless and varied that there is little need to designate peculiarly helpful ones, and, perhaps, some danger in doing so. Miller's "Practical Religion," and other writings, will be acceptable to many girls, while Professor Drummond's dainty booklets, with the "Greatest Thing in the World" in the forefront, will bring light to another class. The first book of "The Imitation of Christ," and Keble's "Christian Year," and the story of "Pilgrim's Progress," without its theology, will never grow old. never grow old,

Then every girl should read a good history Then every girl should read a good history of her own country, and know something of that of other lands. A series called "Stories of the Nations," furnishes easy and pleasant reading. If you are interested in our parent country, Justin McCarthy's "History of Our Own Times" will give a vivid picture of the last fifty years. Thackeray's "Four Georges" will occupy but a few hours, yet will make one realize more clearly the state of society at that period than much study of a deller history. Greene's "Shorter History," and Macaulay's histories, are good for more ambitious readers. bitious renders.

POR biography, read carefully all contemporances character sketches, that you may form a clear and definite idea of the men and women now living and working in the world. Louisa M. Alcott's "Life" will be as helpful to many girls as her "Little Women." George Eliot's and Jane Welsh Carlyle's "Life and Letters" will give much food for thought, while for different lessons we glance at Frances Ridley Havergal's "Life," and Prances Willard's "Glimpses of Fifty Years." Cultivate a taste for reading essays. Live out of doors with John Burroughs in his "Fresh Fielda," and "Birds and Poots," and "Winter Sunshine." Roll in a "Back Log." if it is cold, and sit down by James Russell Lowell's "Study Windows." Be sure to give "The Autocrat of the Breakfast Table" a loving look and smile, and then gird up your

"The Autocrat of the Breakfast Table" a loving look and smile, and then gird up your mental loins and read Emerson's first series of "Master Character," "Spiritual Laws," "Love" and "Friendship," The "Duties of Women," by Frances Power Cobbe, will be a tonic. The "Five Talents of Women" is a new contribution. Macaulay is no longer the fashion, yet much can be gained pleasurably from his essays on Milton, Lord Bacon, Goldsmith, Johnson, Lord Clive and Warren Hastings. Above all, read your "Sessme and Lilies," and the "Ethics of the Dust," and whatever else of Ruskin you can compass and understand. understand.

WHAT SHOULD GIRLS READ?

MRS. WHITNEY TO TRAVEL WITH GIRLS IN "THE WORLD OF READING."

response to a general desire that THE LABURS' HOME JOURNAL shall be of direct assistance in helping its thousands of girl readers in the selection of the best and most entertaining books, the Editor takes most entertaining cooks, the Editor takes much pleasure in announcing that he has arranged with Mrs. Adeline D. T. Whitney for a series of "open letters," addressed to girls, in which she will travel with them through the fascinating realms of "The World of Reading." This will be the general title of the series, and they will partake of the general character of "personally conducted" travel tours, the world of books being the traveling ground, and the most interesting and enter-taining authors and books the objective points. Mrs. Whitney has made almost a life study of girls, their desires, and what pleases them most. She understands them as do few living writers. She has written a store of books for them, and now she will talk about books with them. She will make a personal companion of each girl who reads her articles and will tell her what she can of authors, as well as of what they have written.

The Editor of the Journal feels a peculiar satisfaction in being able to secure Mrs. Whitney's services as in her he is able to present to his girl-readers a writer who is already a favorite with them, a mother who has edu-cated her own girls in their reading, a woman of wide culture, and a literary counselor than whom there is none more reliable for girls to follow.

The first of Mrs. Whitney's series will be printed in the JOURNAL in a month or two.

LITERARY . QUERIES

Under this heading the EDITOR will endeavor to answer any possible question con-cerning authorship and literary matters.

FRANK-"Bill Nye's" name is Edgar Wilson Nye. M. A. S.—A copyright may be secured for a projected work, as well as for a completed one.

HORES DAUGUA — Very long or very short paragraphs should be avoided when writing for the press.

QUEEY-The circulation of Mrs. Stowe's "Uncle Tom's Cabin" has certainly rose up into "the militions." Sessonana.—"The Musician" mentioned in Long-fellow's "Tales of a Wayside Inn," was the Bull, the famous violinist.

HENRIETTE-Jules Verne's books have been defined as "cleverly written impossibilities;" I can give no better definition of them.

Historicos—Francis Scott Key, of Baltimere, Mary-land, wrote "The Star Spangled Banner." I cannot spare space for its publication.

E. V. O.—The work to which you refer, I think, is Sarah Orne Jewett's book, "The Country Doctor," a story of New England, not a poem.

M. L.—"Ceida" is the none de phome of Miss Louisa de la Ramee; she was born to Bury St. Edmonda, Eng-land, in 1840. Her father was French.

W. R.—Anna Letitis Barbauld was an English poetes, who lived between 1721 and 1825. Her poem, from which you quote, is called "Life."

G. E. N.—The publishers of "Toney's Mission" and "Ladde" are not privileged to reveal the name of the author of the books. It has never been disclosed.

SUBSCRIBER—In Tom Martin's play, "Speed the Plough," one of the characters was constantly wonder-ing, "What will Mrs. Groudy say?" hence the ex-pression.

Dona—The Mr. Howells who is writing a story which will shortly appear in the Jouenat. In Mr. W. D. Howells, the neither of "The Rise of Silas Lapham" and "Indian Summer."

Mass C.—The series of "The Brownies Through the Year," concluded in the last October Johns as, will, in all probability, be published in book form, but not until the latter part of next year.

C. K.—The term "Tommy Afkins," so often used by Rudyard Kipding, was first used in tieneral Wolseley's "Bodilers' Handbook," and bassince become the generic term for the British soldler.

M. I. R.—The poem "Retribution" is a translation from the German of Frederick von Logan. The exact quotation is, "Though the mills of God grind slowly, yet they grind exceeding small."

CHANNEL L.—The editor of the JOURNAL is always glad to reed verses with a view to their satisficity for his magnesiate, but he cannot give a personal criticism of them if fromd unavailable for his uses.

TRANSLATOR—By referring to this column in tack issues of the Jorkava. you will find your questions about the rights of translation answered. I cannot answer the same question more than a deem three. P. H.—You are at perfect liberty to send as many secries to an effect and as often as you choose; when he likes your work, he is only the glid to read anything your kindness may lead you to submit to him.

Bounevants—Engene Field has recently celebrate the forty-second antiversary of his hirth; he resides to Chicage, and is attached to the editorial staff of "th News-Record," one of the leading papers of that city.

D. R. P.—if you will write to Mrs. Elia Wheeler Wil-cox, she will deabtless be glad to tell you where you can obtain a copy of her poem, "The End of Binning," a better addressed to her in care of the Journal will be PERPLEXITY—Perhaps if you will write to Mesers, E. P. Putnam's Sons, or the Cassell Company, both publishing houses of New York, they may tell you more than I can shoot the publication of a novel at the expense of the author. E. M.—If you will buy a copy of Elemone Kirk's book, "Periodicals that Pay Contributors," you can have for yourself to which papers to send your wares. The Joursan can secure the book for you, if you desire, for $1.00, postage free.

P. E. H.—"The Young Men's Journal" is published insulfilly at 4th West Church Street, Elmira, N. V. It is estaed by a woman, Mrs. George Archibald Paimer. In the editorial columns of the paper size uses the name of Mrs. George Archibald.

Onesea—It is perfectly proper for you to address any author if you desire his or her antograph; be careful to enclose stamped and self-addressed envelope. You can address the author whose autograph you desire in care of his or her publishers.

WESTERS GIRL; K. B.; C. L. T.; Ina, and others— The best massiscript paper for a writer to use has ac-often been described in this column that I cannot take up the space to answer your question again. Befor to the back numbers of the Jouanal.

Many Inquinces—The author of "Black Beauty" was a Miss Anna Sewell, an English girl who had been an lovalid most of her life, and who unhapping died without knowing of her remarkable success. The book was begun in 1871; it author died in 1878.

Marrisa—Tennyson succeeded Wordsworth as Post Laureaus of England, in November, 1830. The salary attached to the office is said to be very small. The "Leylis of the King" were dedicated to the memory of Prince Albert, the husband of Queen Victoria. Tenny-son lives on the Isle of Wight.

Gracts—An article, story, or posm that has been published abould never be offered for equibilishing un-less the fact is stated in submitting the manuscript to the second periodical. Unless in special cases, periodi-cals of any standing never care to print a manuscript

PURELEM - You will find the expression "beenan warious" in Dicken's novel "Our Mutual Friend." (2) You most not be too hasty in drawing conclusions. Mis-Massos would not have been guilty of an error in her story. The phrase is a "currious one," but not any more curious than thousands of others.

M. E. W.—Rt is impossible for Mr. Rok to personally read all the manuscripts sent to the Louanat, and for this reason be employs a staff of "readers." He en-deavors, however, to look over as many manuscripts as his other duties will allow. Roading manuscripts is a very small part of a busy efflor's duties.

Novers—Shakespears is supposed to have married Anne Hadhaway when he was about eighteen years of age. Nothing very dedute is known contenting the post, except that he was born at otrasford-agen. Avm, married there, went to Lendon, where he wrote poems and plays, and then returned to Avm, where he died.

Anxiotis Reader.—"Writers' cramp." Is not considered as incurable disease. Massage and electricity takes in connection with a charge to a penholder that will not restrict the muscles; holding the pen between different functors; using a flexible pen, and being careful not to held the hand in a cramped position, will usually work a core.

Branche—The nom de plume should only be attached to the manuscript and not to her letter, unless the nation which is completely red her letenty. In that case, she can use her nom de plume for all purposes. (2) I have never heard the story of which you speak referred to as a piece of classic literature. Very few of our modern novels are entitled to that reference.

A Consession of the August Journal, and says that "Miss Lou," and not "The Earth Trembled," was the last Lou," and not "The Earth Trembled," was the last novel written by the late E. P. Ros. In our answer we intended to say that "The Earth Trembled" was the last complete novel written by Mr. Ros: "Miss Lou" was not finished at the time of Mr. Ros" death, but was, however, completed by another hand and published.

THE PAINTING OF CHRYSANTHEMUMS

HRYSANTHEMUMS, in their beautiful variety of form and color, make a per-ticularly effective and artistic subject for either pencil or brush, and one that is full of possibilities, whether treated in a purely pictorial manner, or more conventionally from a decorative standpoint. In painting a picture, whether in oils or water color, very much of the ultimate success will color, very much of the ultimate success will depend upon the arrangement and grouping of the study represented, and due thought and consideration must be given to the matter in order that in composing the picture the coloring may be effective and in keeping, and the lines thoroughly harmonious. Individual tasts will be exercised as to the amount of work or elaborate detail it is advisable to undertake. In some instances the subject may merely consist of a couple of flowers with long stems and foliage, arranged in a slender specimen glass, which, skillfully treated, can be worked into an effective little picture; or a great number of blooms may be massed, and the atmost made of their richly gradating and contrasting tones. contrasting tones.

THE picturesqueness and interest of a group can be greatly added to by the judicious selection of the vase or jar in which the flowers are placed, and, furthermore, the coloring used for the background, if good, will assist greatly in the general effect. As a rule, it is advisable to choose flowers in which the tones blend one into the other, that is to say, make the group of vellows decreasing into make the group of yellows deepening into brownish bues, and mingle pinkish blooms with darker ones of a rich reddish color. Yellow flowers look well held in one of the old-fashioned earthenware jugs or tankards, which are of a dull yellow color in the lower part and of a chocolate brown above, and with this a warm neutral color will be the best tone to employ for the background, which may be obtained by mixing burnt sienna, in-digo and white. Yellow or reddish brown flowers are also pretty placed in blue and white vases, with a greenish grey background, made by mixing cobalt and white with either raw under or vellow other using the former raw under or yellow other, using the former for the deeper tones and the latter where the coloring should be lighter. White flowers may be put into white Japanese or Chinese vases, the touches of color in the design upon the ware proving very effective.

I N selecting the canvas for a study of chrys-authemums to be painted life-size in oils do not choose it of too fine a texture, the coarser quality proving a more satisfactory ground to work upon. Bither flat or round brushes may be employed, but the flat French brushes are usually considered the best kind brushes are usually considered the best kind to use. The group being arranged, take a piece of charcoal and roughly sketch in the general proportions and positions of the flowers and foliage, omitting detail, but taking special pains to get the throw of the blooms and the direction of the stems gracefully and correctly indicated. If the artist is sufficiently skillful the drawing of the separate petals and the details of buds and foliage can be put in later directly with the brush, otherwise they must be enrefully sketched in gradually as the picture advances, but not all at once where there are many flowers in the group, for from day to day the blooms are apt to change or perhaps they die and have to be replaced, which would involve an unnecessary amount of extra trouble to the worker, inasmuch as of extra trouble to the worker, inasmuch as the drawing would, in consequence, have to be altered or modified.

BEGIN the painting by blocking in the patches, not at first attempting to make out patches, not at first attempting to make out the form of each separate petal. Lay in the local coloring and finally the high lights, still working broadly and without detail. When this is partially dry, and in the condition technically known as "tacky," which will probably be the case by the time all the group has been thus laid in, the flowers may be proceeded with by making out the reset promi-nent petals, adding high lights which should be put in touchily and londer on, and em-phasizing shadows, which are always pointed thinly, still, however, leaving some of the forms, especially those in shadow, blended together. It is a great mistake to try and show the outline of every petal in painting chrysanthemums; the effect is hard and conventional when this is done, and the effect of nature is lost. Make out only so much of the forms as is necessary to represent the flower. Finish up each bloom as much as possible in one painting. It may be necessary to do a little general touching up when the picture is nearly finished in order to bring the whole together, but the freshness and vigor of a flower painting is lost if it be too much worked over. In drawing the leaves take as much pains as with the flowers.

THESE flowers are very popular as the subjects of designs upon decorated china, lending themselves admirably with a little adaptation to the purpose, particularly for large and handsome pieces. In sketching the flowers the drawing of them must be simplified as much as possible, probably putting in fewer petals than are seen in nature, but aiming to preserve accurately their character. In china painting an outline is usually considered a necessity, and if properly done need not appear conventional or obtrusive. As a rule, violet of iron is the best color to employ, but in brown or red flowers red brown should be substituted. It is an open question whether it is better to outline the flowers before or after the washes are laid on. If done before, the danger exists, unless the outline be very thoroughly dried, of the color washing up, and if put in later there is the probability of the pencil marks having become obliterated, a serious difficulty to an inexperienced draughtswoman. The best remedy when complicated drawing needs to be carefully preserved, is to secure the outline first by putting it in with mineral water color, which can be fired together with the other ordinary colors. The following schemes of color are suggested for the different varieties: For white flowers, siver yellow and black in the shadows, overcast in the next painting with yellow ochre to gain warenth; mixing yellow is used for the yellowish tint toward the center of the flowers, the accentuation being done with brown green and dark green. Yellow blossoms are yellowish tint toward the center of the flow-ers, the accentration being done with brown green and dark green. Yellow blossoms are laid in with mixing yellow, the half tones with black, silver yellow and a little deep bine green: use in the second painting also a little silver yellow and yellow other, put on sep-arately, and accentuate with dark green mixed with brown green. Keep the red and brown flowers lighter than they are in reality, as before suggested, laying them in with rose pompadour, carnation No. 1, or mixing yel-low, according to the color needed. Use in working them up some or all of the following working them up some or all of the following tints: yellow ochre, silver yellow, chestnut brown, carnation No. 1, violet of iron, red brown by itself and also mixed with dark brown No. 4 or 17.

The chief rule to be remembered in china painting is that each tint must be thoroughly dried before another is applied. This is best done in an oven. A little oil of lavender is used in applying the colors.

In all kinds of painting the palette should be kept as simple as possible, and the utmost made of the few colors employed. The manner of applying the paints is the most important point to master. The same, or equally good, effects can be obtained with a widely different choice of pigments. Therefore the following suggestions, intended for the inexperienced, must not be regarded as in any sense arbitrary. For white flowers, the delicate shadows can be obtained by mixing ivory black, lemon yellow and white. For the creamy tone of the local color, and a little yellow ochre to the silver white employed. For the warm tone sometimes seen in the white flowers, use a very little Indian red, blended into the greenish tone of the shadow. In the yellow blossoms use no white paint at all, as it destroys the brilliancy of the yellow pigments, the high lights being obtained according to the tone required with pale lemon yellow or French Naples yellow. In the shadows employ lemon yellow and black, and all the other tones required can be obtained with raw umber, raw sienna, burnt sienna, light cadmium and lemon yellow. The lemon with raw umber, raw sienna, burnt sienna, light cadmium and lemon yellow. The lemon chrome added of late years to Winsor and Newton's list, forms a good substitute for the more ton's list, forms a good substitute for the hand expensive lemon yellow, if price be an object, For the reddish brown variety, with a creamy under side to the petals, use for the latter, yel-low ochre and white, adding a little ivory black for the shadows, emphasizing the mark ings where necessary with lemon yellow. According to the tone, use raw or burnt sienna in the local color of the flowers with either yellowish high lights of yellow ochre and white, or reddish ones made with burnt sienna and white. and white. Raw umber and crimson lake is sometimes needed in the darker parts. In flowers of a pink or plakish has use scarled vermillion or rose madder with white, accord-ing to the shade required, for the lighter parts. In the half tones employ rose madder. Make the shadows of lemon vellow and black, work ing pink into them if they seem too green. In the darker flowers, burnt sienna or crimson lake will be required. Burnt sienna is also useful for the sharp, warm shadows and mark-ings in the parts of the foliage near the blooms. For the cool gravish, lights on the leaves mix cobalt, yellow other and white, and for the yellowish high lights use lemon yellow and ivory black. A good local green is made with Antwerp blue, raw sienna, yellow chrome and white, and a darker shade is obtained by mixing indigo and burnt sienna with yellow othre chrome, according to the color desired.

Much the same colors, omitting the white paint, are used if the picture be in water color instead of oils.

HELP IN WORK WORK

Under this heading I will be glad to answer, every month, questions relating to Art and Art work. MAUDE HAYWOOD.

M. A. S.—The magazine you inquire about is published in New York.

E. M.—You can obtain an art training in the school of Fine Arts, St. Loois, Mo.

Aspironer.—I am not acquainted with the details of the arrangement of the classes at the school you name. Write direct to the secretary for the information you require.

CLINTON—Answers can never be given in the next number of the Journals. I am sorry that your kindly sent suggestions were not exactly available for ose in my department.

N. G. R.—It is absolutely requisite that a would-be librativitor should have a thorough knowledge of draw-ing. Write for their prospectus to the Art Institute, Michigan Avenue, Chirago, III.

F. P.—Use fresh spirits of turpentine with the offs to to prevent them spreading upon sails or other fabrics. Apply the colors very thinly, taking care not to have the brush too full or motel, particularly in working against the edges.

This Councies—See reply to "Various Inquirers." It would be extremely unjust to send a poem, or any matter already published in one paper to another paper or magazine, without distinctly stating that it has already been printed.

E. B. D. Continue the light-blue background as sug-gestive of sky throughout all three panels, and make the third panel of white roses. The introduction of some daintly painted butterfiles, or dragueffies and bees, will give a more life-like effect, and add interest to the studies.

To Various Inquinens—Addresse of firms cannot be published in this column, and requests to do so will, for the future, have to be ignored. (2) Most bouses that publish Christmas cards, colored pictures and calculates are likely to be open to accept good designs coming from any quarter.

A. V. P.—The duliness of the finished picture may be remedied by rubbing in a little Ruberson's medians. The painting most, on on account, be varnished, until several mostles have elapsed after its completion, in order that the colour may have time to become thor-oughly set and hardened.

AMANDA—Since you know the full name and the publisher of the books about which you inquire, you can surely procure them through any large book firm, who would import them for you if they are not kept in stock. We constantly repeat that addresses of firms are not published in the correspondence columns of the JOURNAL.

Mas. D. D. S.—The proper medium to use with the glit and bronze powders is usually sold with them. (2) The commonest kind of camel hair brushes are good erough to employ in applying the bronzes, and they should be rimed thoroughly in a little of the medium immediately after use, to prevent the hairs becoming stiff and clogged.

M.—The drawings you refer to were probably done in gounche, namely, in black and Chinese white, upon water-color paper, which is the usual method of making stotches for reproduction by the half-time process. (2) The most ordinary methods of preparing drawings for publication are in pen and ink, or in gounche. Historicions are sometimes reproduced directly from photographs.

Mrs. Robert T.—A series of articles on water color painting were published during the first six months of this year in the Journax, the preliminary paper in the January number giving the requisite information as to the list of colors and outfit necessary. There is a handbook on water color painting in the Winsor and Newton series; a short treatise on landscape painting by Peniey contains useful bints for students.

X, Y, Z.—Animals can be sketched while in motion, but it requires an expert draughtsman to do so successfully. Beatmore should practice the drawing of the animal whilst at rest, until they have gained a thorough knowledge of its structure. They should also train their flacility of observation, frequently sketching from memory, in order, by gaining facility in such work, to render them more capable of coping with the difficulties of making life-like studies of animals in action.

Datey—Set the palette for your study with raw um-ber, yellow ochre, light cacheline, crimson take, rose madder, benon yellow, from black and white, and possibly a little scarlet vermilion, if the fruit be very reay. For the glass of water lake special pains to get it correct in drawing, load the highest lights, making them very sharp, paint the reflections or objects seen through the clear glass in their satirral colors, and put in the shadows thinly. Get as much effect with as little work as possible.

M. G. 8.—If you wish to that the dishes a pale moss green, you might be able to marriage it yourself; but if they are to be of a deep shade, the process is a different one, and too difficult for an inexperienced amateur to manage with likelihood of success. In any case, it would be better to have a lesson from a practical decreator in theirs before setting to work upon the dishes. As a matter of expense, you could probably get them done for you by scene artist or firm nearly if not quite as cheapiv as you could not them for yourself, and much more satisfactority, considering your entire ignorance of china painting.

F. B. H.—By all means take a course in some good training school. If you can come into New York for the purpose, go to the New York fastitude for Art Artistans, on Twenty-third Street, provided you are able to pay for your instruction. Should it not be possible for you to bear the expense of as art education, you might take advantage of the free training offered by the Cooper institute. Eighth Street and Posenth Avenue. Address the Saperintendent of the Women's Art School. You would probably have to walt some months for a vacancy after making your application, but the opportunity is a great boen to stragging students.

B. R.—The monograms for a table cloth should measure about three and a half to four bethes in beight, and be a good deal smaller for the center piece. dl A pretty idea for the united initials you name would be to set them within a triangle, having the apex pointed down userf; the large C must be placed below, and the C and B saited by the size & which, binding together the two initials, can, together with them, be gracefully intertwined with the upper part of the large C. (3) If the table cloth is to be in drawn work, a good quality of round thread lines must be employed, otherwise figured seith damask may be chosen. You will probably find some belpful bints in the article on "Drawn Work for the Table," published this month in the Journals.

the Table," published this month in the Journal.

Mas. C. B.—I am afraid your questions are too many to be fully answered. The information shout the sandplantiered walls you can probably anystre best from your decorates. I think it a good plan to keep pretty much to your former exhence of coloring in the new rooms if the time you mans go well with the furniting you will continue to use. If well cheese, stended decorations are profity and effective. I should prefer soons off hone to dead white for the bed-room walls. Single or doubtefacets flax victours is particularly effective for inexpensive hangings, which can be enrithed, if desired, with controduced dado or friene. If you do not wish, at present, to re-upholster the old benechair chairs with the presty frames, how would you like to make covere for them in some thempersalys material, such as chints, which can be precured in artistic coloring and designs?

B. P.—For the nontrait of a richie-colored brunethes, a which can be procured in artistic coloring and designed. B. P.—For the portrait of a richity-colored brunches, a white background if skillfully managed, is very effective. Put a touch of yellow color in the white, and touch of which invery black, adding robal, and despening the color into a resulted greenish gray at the lower part of the picture. If recessary: or the same pigments can be mised to produce a grayish green true, which forms a good relief to almost any complexion, can worker being substituted for the yellow exhrs to despen the color where required. For a dark background to a fair-baired halt, giver being install a good relef to use; if a light ground be preferred, make it of a soft grayish blue. ### FOOD FOR THE GROWING BABY

HEN a beby has cut its first tooth, and does not seem quite satisfied with the al-lowance of milk that up to this time has contented it. more food is needed and the diet must be increased.

This does not mean that it should have "a taste of everything." It seems incredible that after all the warnings doctors have given on this point there are still mothers and nurses who believe that it "strengthens" the haby to eat a little of everything of which its elders partake. When this monstrous proceeding disorders the child's digestion they ascribe the pain to "wind;" or if an attack of cholera infantum carries it off to a better world they recognize the loss as a decree of Providence and submit while they mourn. It rouses both indignation and pity to think of what babies have to suffer for want of a little common sense and intelligence in those who take care (?) of them.

THE dict of a child from six months to three years old should be as carefully regulated as in the first weeks of its life. When the change is made from milk alone, begin by thickening it with oatmeal, or barley gruel; sago agrees with some children; wheat bread softened with warm milk can be used, the crust being cut off. Rice can be boiled to a jelly and added to the milk, or wheat flour well cooked if there is a tendency to diarrhou. a jelly and added to the milk, or wheat flour well cooked, if there is a tendency to diarrhosa. All the cereals require long cooking to make them digestible. Some delicate children will thrive upon arrowroot and milk. It is often necessary to try several varieties of food before one is found which the child can digest. Usually milk must be the basis, with one of the cereals added to it.

OCCASIONALLY we have to deal with a O child who cannot take milk, or can only bear a little, not enough for nourisbment. only bear a little, not enough for nourselment.

Then it must be supplemented with beef juice, squeezed from the meat, beef tea, chicken or mutton broth. The white of a fresh egg shaken in a bottle with a cup of water may be tried, giving half the quantity at once. The gruels made with water instead of milk may be digested. It is hard to find a satisfactory substitute for milk, and children with whom it disagrees are absence an anxioty notif tory substitute for milk, and children with whom it disagrees are always an anxiety until they are able to eat solid food in abundance. Bread soaked in the juice from rare roast beef, or mutton, or rice boiled soft and covered with the same juice, may succeed in pleasing the fastidious digestive organs. Salt should be added to all food, and a small quantity of sugar to the gruels, as the latter helps to in-crease the deposit of fat.

FRUIT should be used sparingly for little children under three years old; after a year old, if in perfect health, with no tendency to diarrhea, they may have a spoonful of orange juice occasionally, or a little of the soft part of a baked apple, smoothly scraped from the skin. Raw fruit is apt to disagree with them, particularly bananas. After two years old a few fresh, sweet, well-ripened strawberries, or raspherries, can be given, but the effect must be watched and the fruit stopped if there is any symptom of indigestion. Fruit should always be eaten in the morning. The watchful mother will soon find that what does no harm to one child may find that what does no harm to one child may seriously disagree with another, and will govern her charges accordingly.

Wilen a year and a half old, children may have taked potators and some of the fresh green regetables, as peas and beans. About the same age, if most of the teeth have come, they may have ment at dinner. Steak, mutton chops, roast beef and meat of chicken, cut fine, as they cannot masticate them proposed to the steak of the steak of the steak. erly, may be given. Salt meat, the dark meat of poultry, with gravies and made dishes, must be avoided. Fresh fish may be eaten but must not be fried.

Eggs should be cooked by placing them in boiling water, removing the saurepan from the fire and letting the eggs remain in the water ten minutes, so that the whites will not be hardened. One a day is enough to use.

The best test of the digestibility of the food is the improvement of the child. It should gain steadily in weight, the scales showing a slight increase every week. The eyes should be bright, the flesh firm, the skin clear and the whole appearance betoken health. When a baby is alling, in a large majority of cases the food is at fault. An experienced family physician will usually be able to tell where the trouble is, and to suggest what the child needs to correct it. One of the artificial foods may answer the purpose.

GAMES THAT ASSIST THE MEMORY.

II.-By Mas, A. G. Lewis

play "Bank Lotto" mix the lottos well. Deal out five to each with letters turned downward, also four on center of table or board, the letters turned upward. The remaining lottos constitute the "bank" to draw from. Play by turns, using one letter only from those dealt to the using one letter only from those dealt to the player, with any or all of those spread upon the board, thus: The player may hold the letter d. Upon the board may lie the letters m, o, l, u. He can make the word mould. This makes a "sweep." At each round, if the player cannot form a word, he must lay a lotto upon the table, then draw one from the bank. After a sweep the next player must lay one upon the board, then draw one from the bank.

In the game it is always better to part with

In the game it is always better to part with consonants rather than vowels; also to retain the prize letters in hand as long as possible, with the hope of finding a chance to use them. At any time in the game use the prize letters, if possible.

This game is often varied by playing "Thiev-ing Lotto," and is arranged in this wise;

Each player forms the words as above, but spreads them before him on the table. For instance, he makes the word "hard." The next player holds the letter e and has the privilege of inserting this letter, making the word "heard" or, holding the letters e and r be bespeaks the word "harder." He plays the letter e and will wait his next turn to play the letter e and will wait his next turn to play the letter r; then he may claim the word.
Meanwhile another player, whose turn comes before the player who has "bespoken," may hold the letter r and claim the word "harder" and spread it before him.

The game is thus very spirited and amusing;
with a group of bright students the contest becomes sharp. It furnishes one of the very heat helps toward enlarging one; were harder.

becomes sharp. It furnishes one of the very best helps toward enlarging one's vocabulary and verifying one's knowledge of spelling. In "Thieving Lotto" the reckoning of score is the same precisely as for "Spelling Lotto." "Bank Lotto" is reckoned thus: Prize letters single, 1 ench; double, 2 each. A sweep counts 3; to clear the board at the last round, 4; the largest number of cards, 5. The game is 50.

Thousands of homes are so remotely sitnated that it is quite impossible for purents to provide their little people with suitable games. In many homes there is little extra money for buying such luxuries. Yet desimble games may be made by an ingenious boy with the help of saw, hammer, gimlet and jack-knife; while his sister with scissors, mucilage and a box of paints, may construct many pretty and use-ful games for younger brothers and sisters. The "Heart Target" is made thus: Mark

The "Heart Target" is mode thus: Mark upon a smooth board one inch thick the shape of a heart, the proportions being 2 x 1½ feet. Follow the mark carefully with a saw of narrow width. Smooth the edges with sand paper, and, if convenient, paint the same red, yellow or blue. Then get two dozen medium-sized wardrobe hooks. Screw them into the board with hooks set to turn upright. At the back of hoost factor with hisroes twastandaria. back of board fasten with hinges two standards so that the slope of the board may be adjusted to suit the swing of the ring. The ring is or metal, brass or steel, fastened to a book in metal, brass or steel, fastened to a hook in the ceiling above, or to a gas fixture, by a moderately strong cord. The slope of the board must be such that the ring may catch upon any of the hooks. The lowest hook is hardest to capture. The contest is to catch the ring upon as many hooks as possible; also upon those that count the most. An hour of this game is a good arithmetic lesson when each player is required to reckon his own score. If the players are very young each hook may be reckoned as one, "A Counting Frame"—not a new inven-tion—is both interesting and helpful to young children. With it they can keep the scores of children. With it they can keep the scores or games before they are able to perform the reckoning mentally. A very pretty frame may be made from the sticks of a large-sized slate, such as may be bought in any country these. Rivet the corners firmly. Bore ten stare. Rivet the corners firmly. Bore ten gimlet holes upon either of the opposite sides of the frame. If convenient, get ten different colors of beads; otherwise use two colors— one light and one dark, fifty of each color. String ten beads upon each of the ten cords, an equal number of each color. The beads give an excellent color object lesson. The frame may be prettily decorated and set upon feet. To string the frame is a pleasant task for young children.

A pretty "Doll" or "Santa Claus Book" may be made thus: Cut for the cover a large picture of Santa Claus or a doll. Poste this upon card-board; then cut the board neatly by the outlines of the picture. Cut from card-board, a thinner quality would be better, a dozen more or less exact duplicates in shape. Upon each page paste pretty pictures and verses about Christmas and Santa Claus or about dolls and their belongings. Tie the pages together rather loosely upon one side so that when the book is opened the pages may lie flat upon the table.

Many other delightful books may be made in the same way. Nothing could be prettler for holiday zifts. They may serve as scrap books to hold pictures and verses that children enjoy and prize highly that otherwise might be destroyed. be destroyed.

THE MOTHER WHO WORRIES

MOTHERS who worry should fight the bad habit as if it were a physical enemy. Bear the troubles of to-day bravely, and do not borrow those of to-morrow. In elimbing a mountain we sometimes come to what looks like a well of sometimes come to what looks like a wall of rock. There seems no way post it; our progress is stopped. Lucking closer we see a narrow path on the face of the cliff, wide enough to lead us to safety. Look for the path. There is always a way.

TRANSIENT BAD HABITS

TRANSIENT BAD HABITS

To the benefit of some inexperienced mothers, I want to say do not worry over all the bad babits of babies. My experience is that as the little ones grow, of themselves they drop many troublesome ways. I find it does not pay to be always worrying them and conselves over every little thing that is not exactly as we would wish. My bey of three and a half years began life under any but propitious circumstances. A deficate child, with a frail father and a nervous, over-strained mother, his first few months of life were not those of ragture and domestic bias, that sometimes attend the advent of the first-born; on the contrary, they were of torture to all three.

Of necessity some habits were contracted that under other circumstances would have never gained a footing. For instance, it was imperative for the comfact of the whole neighborhood that each time he took a rap I should rock and sing him to sleep. Of course, this was very trying to me, but as the little fellow grow stronger he did not require so much care in other respects, and soon, of his our accord; stopped all this nevel as many other troublesome ways, so that from being the most trying of babies he has become one of the best of children. Do not be discouraged. With systematic, methodical care of your children you can accomplish a great deal, and in time many disagreeable features with a COMEONT EOR RABIES.

COMFORT FOR BABIES

COMFORT FOR BABIES

DON'T let the nurse pin the bands so tightly about the soft little form that a full respiration will be impossible. Don't use linenshirfs; buy soft Naxony woven ones and use the same kind of bands after the baby is two weeks old. Full flat buttens on the bands of kirbs, and den't use pins. Don't use canton finance dispers; buy cotton bin't-soy-e-lit is the nicest kind. Don't pin the little whocking to the dispers, but arrange supporters buttoned to petitional bands on to strong elastic. Don't put long clothes on a baby; twenty-five luckes from the neck to the bottom of the heat is long enough for any new-born baby. Den't put a veil on to make the eyes weak and crossed. Don't use heavy bed-covers; have the downlest ones you can make or bay. Don't make your baby sheep in all list clothes—shirt, diaper and night-gown are all a year-old-child, or even eight months, should weer. And lastly, hover eaken your child to show it to anyone. It does a world of harm, and injures the nervous system, eften permanently. K. W. L.

A SIMPLE DEVICE

A SIMPLE DEVICE

I WANT to tell the mothers who read the Journal.

I how I keep my children warm in bed during the "kirking" age. Until I discovered this way I found it impossible to keep the resides little ones under the corers. I tried pinning the covers down, tring them down, and pinning the children in blankets, but all methods were unsatisfactory.

I take an old poir of my historical underdrawers and put them on ever the night panties, drawing the body part well up under the arms and pin to the nightle in front and back jakes torn up the part of drawer log that extends below the feet and pin it to the nightle. Pixed in this way they are free to kick and move about, but are quite warm even if outside the bed-covers. I put a light covering over them without pinning. If quite cold
I put on a sacque to keep shoulders and arms warm.

One of this Mothesas,

A MOTHER'S WORDS

THERE are many where than I to write words of wisdom, but there are thred mothers I long to encournge. They are offen decouraged with many cares, with the thoughtless gayedy of their children, who seem to heed so little their wishes or advice. But, oh mothers, the words that seem to fall on heedless cars are treasmed in their hearts. In the years to come memory will whisper them over again, perhaps at some moment when their minds are trembling in the balance between good and evil.

Years are I heard an old gentleman say to a young man in his employ, "Why cannot I conviction," "I will tell you why," the yeang man answered. "My mother tanght me that, and what others teach you may forget, what year mother traches you, never," He was thousands of miles from that mother and she never knew he said it, but it seems a pity she did not. Many other mothers, in., whose birdens are heavy, may be elsered by the thought that when the basy hands are folded and the seal of slience set upon the mother's light her whelly-speken words will linger with her children with all the weight of a mother's influence until death.

WASHING BARY'S BOTTLE

WASHING BABY'S BOTTLE

I's cleaning baby's bottle I find there is nothing better
I than warm—not hot—sofa water. Blase first in cold water, then use warm water and soda in the proportion of one-half reaspoonful of soda to a pint of water, Wash'the bottle and tubes in this once a day, using the brushes, and rheduccurefully in char, warm water, and abab's bottle will be sweet and clean, and so clear that It will sparkle.

BABY'S CLOTHES OPENING BEHIND

I WOULD like to say to "Anabous" in August Tours-NAL, to be sure to make all her haby's garments to eyen in the back. I found it so much better for both beby and myself. I also gut sleeves in flannel petit-lecule, substituting them for shirts while he wore the knit bands. Placing shirt sleeves inside dress before putting it on him sayed much time and patience on both sides.

CHILDMEN'S CAMES

My two grandchildren, six and eight years old, have always been rather original in their plays. The one that interests them longest and one they often resort to is this?

Taking an old calabeace and couting out everything that people use or wear in a bouse, they arrange the different rooms and keep house, using the pictures of men, wewens and children for the household.

They do everything with them done in an ordinary, everythy house-send their children to different schools, have weldlings picules, parties, burdless, etc.

Lately they have added to this by cetting from an old seed catalogue, fruit, varytables and flowers, and arranging the different yards and sardess about a bouse. Sometimes they slay on the dining-room cable, but more often on the floor.

BABY'S BLANKET

I SENT for and have just received a copy of your walnable little book. "A Bahe's Requirements." It gives me just what I want to know, only I do not quite understand how to make the blanket. How can you knit them so lance with seedles, or do you knit them is tries and then see these together, or can I crecket one? If you will kindle tell me just how to make one I will appreciate it ever so much.

If N. Savage.

Use rubber or bone needles long enough to contain the 123 stitches needed for the width of the blanket. Knit three stitches plain and three ribbed across the needle. Turn the work and repent, always beginning with three plain stitches. Strips can be knitted and seem stitches. Strips can be knitted and sewn together, but it is not as clustic when finished. One can be crocheted in star or broche stitch. or any pretty stitch you fatery. Stripes of colored wood can be knifted at each end, but these are apt to fade in washing. Several rows of narrow ribbon, run in after the blanket is finished, are better.

TH every housekeeper, more especially those having young children, the milk supply is a seri-ous question. It is un-derstood by most housewives, but unfortu-nately not by all, that disease and death may be caused in the family through contaminated milk or water. Almost any kind of food will give indications of deany kind of food will give indications of de-cay, either by a changed appearance or a dis-agreeable odor; but it frequently happens that the nsilk or water is to all appearances perfectly good when really it contains the germs of disease. It is important, therefore, that every precaution be taken by the housekeeper to insure the purity of these two fluids. This mouth I will consider milk, and at some fu-ture time take up the subject of water for do-

PRECAUTIONS ABOUT MILK

PRECAUTIONS ABOUT MILK

MILK is liable to be affected by the health and food of the animals supplying it. Frequently it happens that animals can eat certain herbs which apparently do not injure them, yet which poison the milk. If a cowdrinks polluted water her milk will be contaminated, although the animal may not seem to be affected. Under certain conditions, bacteria develop very rapidly in milk. If vessels in which the milk is kept be not perfectly clean, or if the room or refrigerator contain any decaying substance, the milk will quickly be affected. For example, at a farmhouse the members of the family became ill, and the cause was traced to the milk. Upon investigation it was found that the milk utensils and milk room had been kept perfectly clean and milk room had been kept perfectly clean and the cows and their surroundings were in a healthy condition. The floor of the milk room was torn up and it was found that the trouble had come from the decaying timbers. Clean utensils, neat surroundings and pure air are necessary safeguards in handling milk.

HOW TO STERILIZE MILK

O's reading the directions it seems as if the process of sterilizing milk might be a simple one; yet it is not. The greatest care must be used in every step of the operation. Have plenty of wide-mouthed bottles of the size you wish to use, and if the milk is not to size you wish to use, and if the milk is not to be transported cotton batting may be used to cover them. If, however, the milk is to use on a journey the bottles or jars must be sealed. Put a layer of hay in the bottom of a wash-boiler. Scald the bottles by laying them in a pan of cold water and heating the water to the boiling point. Fill the bottles with perfectly pare milk, and put on the covers, or the cutton batting over the top. Arrange them in the wash-boiler, putting hay between them; then put in enough cold water to come up to about half the height of the bottles. Heat the water to the boiling point and boil for one hour. Take from the fire and let the bottles cool gradually, to prevent breaking. After they gradually, to prevent breaking. After they have stood for two days boil as before. Cool again, and let them stand for one day; then boil for the third time. This milk should keep indefinitely.

The reason for the cooling and boiling again is this: At the first boiling all the bacteria are killed, but there are latent germs in the milk which will develop in a day or two, and the sec-ond boiling is to kill these. The third boiling is to insure completely against danger from any of these germs that may not have sprouted after the first boiling. This milk is, of course, only for long keeping, and where one can get a fresh supply every day the simple precaution of subjecting it for a short time to the boiling point or even to a lower temperature an-point, or even to a lower temperature, answers for most purposes.

The property of coagulation which milk possesses should be understood by every one. If certain kinds of acids be mixed with milk which is at a temperature of about 100° and of acids and will prove the formed. a solid curd will quickly be formed. When a person drinks milk the warmth of the stomach and the gastric juices congulate the fluid. If the milk be drunk rapidly it will form one solid mass, but if it be sipped the curd will be broken into small parts, and therefore will be digested with greater ease. If the body be overheated when the mllk is taken rapidly, the cord formed will be hard, and may bring on a dangerous attack of indigestion. This is the case, too, when a quantity of acid is taken into the stomach just before or after drinking nsilk. The rule, therefore, should be to drink milk slowly and not to take any great quantity of acid into before or after. sity of acid just before or after,

POINTS ABOUT PASTEUR'S PROCESS

A N eminent English physician, W. B.
Cheadle, says that boiling milk alters the congulability of the caseine, causing it to coagulate in smaller and lighter masses.
This, of course, means that the milk is more casily digested. Cheadle gives the digestibility of condensed, boiled and fresh milk in this way: 1 condensed; 2 boiled; 3 fresh milk or condensed, boried and fresh milk in this way: 1, condensed; 2, boiled; 3, fresh milk. Some chemists differ from this authority, and say that boiled milk is harder to digest than the uncooked article. "When doctors dis-agree, who shall decide?" However, since boiling milk kills the bacteria, it is a safeguard boiling milk kills the bacteria, it is a safeguard that no one should neglect to use when there is any doubt of the wholesomeness of the milk, or when it is bought from the milkman. For babies, young children and invalids, this is almost a necessity in hot weather. I will, therefore, give some instructions in the meth-ods of sterilizing and Pasteurizing milk. Where milk that has been subjected to high termograture is not liked or does not agree temperature is not liked or does not agree with a child or invalid, the milk may be Pasteurized, and if it is to be used within forty-eight hours this is all that is necessary forty-eight hours this is all that is necessary in any case. Pasteur gave the world this process for the preservation of wines, hence the name. He found that microscopic organisms in wine were destroyed at a temperature of 131°. Milk, however, requires at least ten degrees higher temperature. Scald the bottles as directed for sterilized milk. Fill them with pure milk, and after tying cotton batting over the openings, place the jars in a steamer. Have a kettle of cold water on the fire and place the steamer, over this. Observe when place the steamer, over this. Observe when the water begins to boil, and loosen the cover the water begins to boil, and loosen the cover of the steamer, that a part of the steam may escape. Keep the milk in the steamer for twenty minutes after the water begins to boil; then remove it and cool gradually. Be careful not to let cold air blow upon the bottles when they are first taken from the fire, as the rapid cooling of the glass will, in most instances, result in breaking it. It is safer to lift them off in the steamer and let them remain in it until partially cooled.

One can purchase a double boiler with an extra upper kettle, the bottom of which is perforated.

Do not remove the cotton batting from the

SOME SUGGESTIONS ABOUT BEDS

MANY inquiries come as to the latest fashions in pillows, bolsters, spreads, shams, etc., but I am sorry to say not one person has asked for the most healthful and comfortable kind of a bed. Now, while it is proper and commendable to have the bed look beautiful, this should be never done at the expense of comfort or health.

The simpler all the arrangements of the hed are the better. While the bedsteed should be substantially made, it should be put together so simply that it can be taken apart at ease. It should never be made shorter than six feet and a half (inside measurement); for nothing is more uncomfortable than a bed that is too short for a tail person to stretch out in comfortably. The springs should be as in comfortably. The springs should be as simple and strong as possible, and so con-structed that they can be removed from the bed and brushed with ease. Those made wholly of steel are the best, on the score of cleanliness.

If one can afford it there is nothing better than hair mattresses. There are, however, several materials which the upholsterer makes up into mattresses that are cheap and quite comfortable. Home-made mattresses are rarely easy. Any irregularity in the mat-tress interferes with the comfort of the sleeper, and the home product is apt to suggest any-thing but a bed of roses, unless you think of it with thorns thrown in. Nothing in the form of a tick filled with loose materials, such as feathers, husks, etc., should be used for a bed. Perfect rest can only be obtained by lying on a mattress that supports every part of the body

When a mattress has been used so long that the spots where the heaviest part of the body rests have become depressed, send it to the upholsterer to have it made over. Be sure that you employ a trustworthy house for this work, because it is quite easy for dishonest people to remove some of the curled hair and substitute some cheap material for it. If the bed be a double one it would be best to have the mattress made in two parts, a square and a rectangular piece. The mattress will wear better and can be turned more easily in this form.

PILLOWS, SHEETS AND LACES

THE kind of pillows is a matter of taste and THE kind of pillows is a matter of taste and habit. It is, of course, much better to use small, thin pillows, then large full ones;
but some people cannot sleep with the head low, and they should not be made restless for the lack of a suitable pillow.

The sheets should be at least two yards and a half long. The pillow-cases must not fit too tightly, because this would make the pillows too hard for most record.

too hard for most people. A bolster cover is not absolutely necessary, but it is a protection

If possible, have nothing on your bed that cannot be washed. Nothing is healthier or cheaper in the end than blankets. Get them of extra length. Unless the bindings be white, remove them and substitute either white cotton or still. Supreme blankets are a great ton or silk. Summer blankets are a great comfort in hot weather, and with proper care will last the greater part of a life-time. They always come single, and may be washed as easily as a sheet.

Bolsters are made full and round, and no pillows are used with them. Sometimes the spread is made long enough to cover them, but oftener a long scarf of the same ma-terial as the spread is thrown over them. Another way is to cover them smoothly with the same material as the spread, gathering it at the ends, and finishing with a tassel. The spreads are made of all sorts of material. If the bolsters be covered smoothly, with a tassel at the end, the material should be of a fine texture; but if the spread be made long enough to cover the bolster, or if a separate scarf be made, any light material may be used. For elegant rooms, a foundation of silk is covered with lace, the silk being in the color used in furnishing the room. This fashion appears to me most inappropriate for a bed. Linen and other washable fabrics are often embroidand other washable fabrics are often embroidered in colors, making handsome and tasteful covers. India muslins and crèpes may be used for the window draperies and spreads in the same manner. Canopies of this muslin or lace are used on brass beds. These curtains are hung only over the head of the bed, and are drawn back and tied to the head of the bedstead with ribbon bows. Such curtains should be long enough to touch the floor.
Lace or muslin curtains should have a foundation of sitk or cambric of the same color as the furnishings of the rooms.

In some of the finest houses in the country the housekeepers still cling to the sensible custom of using sheets and pillow-cases of fine quality, perhaps hemstitched, but nothing more. The spread being white and washable, this certainly is the most comfortable and healthful custom.

PROPER CARE OF REDROOMS.

PROPER CARE OF BEDROOMS

SLEEPING room should have nothing in it that cannot be washed or removed y. The fewer things there are to catch readily. The fewer things there are to catch dust and obstruct ventilation the better. A clean, well-made bed that can be opened for the night without much labor, must always be attractive and in good taste, whether in palace or cottage. One may tire of elaborate farnishings, but never of simplicity in the elegating more. sleeping room.

In the morning take each blanket and sheet from the bed separately, and hang over chairs, so that the wind will blow through them. Shake up the pillows and bolster, and place in the sir. Turn up the mattresses, so that the air may circulate about them. Air the room and bedding for at least an hour; better,

Before putting the mattresses back turn them; then place the bolster in position. Put on the under sheet, tucking it in well at the head. Pass the hand over it to press out every wrinkle, and then tuck it in at the sides and foot. Now put on the upper sheet, tucking it well under the mattress at the foot. Next, put on the blankets, tucking them in at the foot and sides. Should the blankets be donble, have the open side toward the head, that it may be possible to turn one back if the douthe thickness proves too warm. Now turn the sheet back on the blankets, and then turn blankets and sheets down in one smooth fold. Next put on the spread, having it come over the bolster. If pillows be put on the bed in the daytime, place them on the bolster now. All through the work keep in mind that it is important to have the niattress level, and to put on the sheets, blankets, and spread with-out a wrinkle. At night all that will be nec-essary will be to take off the spread and fold it and then turn back the blankets and top

THINGS HOUSEKEEPERS WANT TO KNOW

WHAT she shall do to keep her polished VV furniture from becoming dull and white, is what one woman asks. Dampen a piece of soft old flannel with kerosene and rub the dulled surface; then rub off with a fresh piece of soft flannel. Be sure there is no dust

A correspondent asks if draperies of silk are still hung on the corners of pictures. No; it is not fashionable; and even if it were it would be a difficult matter for any one except a person of rare artistic taste to use draperies in this manner.

Three inquiries in regard to matters in which, probably, thousands of other housekeepers are interested, have been sent to me by one woman. She wants to know about a polish for brass furniture, means of removing grease spots from bricks or the hearthstone. and something in regard to decoration of a bay window. As for the polish, grocers keep a variety of good articles. One, in the form of a paste, appears to be particularly good. For the removal of grease spots, use a strong solu-tion of washing soda. Javelle water, recently described in this department, also is useful.

A strong, small table, bearing a potted palm or some other large plant, makes a pretty ornament for a bay window. Perhaps no other single thing is no effective. Flowers are at all single thing is so effective. Flowers are at all times both a beautiful and inexpensive decoration for the windows.

bealthful dressing is constantly on the increase, and especially at a time when it affects the welfare of another. This is often brought to mind by correspondents asking for directions regarding their underwear and dresses, wishing the latter to remain becoming, modest and still offer no impediment to health, in dressing the weight of clothes may be nodest and still ofter no imposimise to health.

In dressing, the weight of clothes may be greatly reduced by wearing all-wool underwear as a union suit or vest, then a soft bound corset or corset waist with or without shoulder straps and amply large. The stocking supporters should button on the edge of this, and not be worn around the waist as a band. Over this conses the white muslin drawers, which are not necessary with a union ribbed

Over this comes the white muslin drawers, which are not necessary with a union ribbed suit, short white petticoat, flannel skirt and silk or some other long petificoat. A corset cover is put on before the last petticoat, and all of these garments should be upon yokes. A new style of yoke is narrow, and buttons to the edge of the corset. A mediumly low heeled shoe should be worn, and of late it is claimed that wearing low ties makes the ankles stronger. If these are worn, do not neglect cloth galterettes for the street.

FOR dresses, the inevitable wrapper and teagown answer for home occasions, but everyone is better for a change at all times, and a teagown can hardly be worn to even a small dinner at a friend's. For this occasion have a dress that is of the proper length, which means that it must be let down at the top of the front slowing it neveral to keep which means that it must be let down at the top of the front, sloping it upward to keep the bottom edge straight, and with a demitrain back. Any of the trimmings in vogue will answer for the edge, but at the belt omit the darts that make the skirt close-fitting, and gather this fullness or break the plain appearance of the front with two easy, diagonal folds half way to the hips on either side that are run into the belt and invisibly caught lower down. A basone should have a long narrow coat-tail back and jacket fronts that are cut square off just below the weist line, or may be longer and pointed in front, with a blouse front of soft silk that is allowed to droop low, with a friil down the center. These jacket fronts are not only appropriate, but are very fashionable as well. Full-topped sleeves detract from the size of the figure, and when a close-fitting basque is worn a large lace fichu or full jabot have much of the same effect. A princess dress druped to one side, with soft folds below and around the waist, is one of the pretriest of gowns, but is very difficult to fit under such conditions. In such a case the outside material for the entire front is draped in a bias manner over the easy-fitting lining.

TEA-GOWNS, SACQUES, ETC. A VERY pretty maternity gown has a princess back and sides, with the one piece front gathered to a round yoke of heavy piece front gathered to a round yoke of heavy lace over silk, so as to form an erect ruffle; the front hangs long and loose over the fitted lin-ing similar to a Mother Hubbard wrapper, with a cord girdle from the side seams, or a cincture of passementeric about two inches wide loosely catching this fullness up like a drooping plastron. The lace is used for deep cuffs, and the silken gown is really charming. All kinds of paster dressing account are weat-carlis, and the silken gown is really charming. All kinds of pretty dressing sacques are wearable with odd skirts. Those of finely striped wool taffets or flannel are capable of many forms from the manipulations given to the stripes. Chiffon and lace ruffles trim these, but the important set of the skirt front must not be forgotten. Princess wrappers with a loose front are always permissible for mornings, and ten-gowns of more elaborate materials have a loose front of soft wool cripon or China silk which may be left loose or held by a ribbon or soft silk belt. A new style for these has the outer fronts turned down from the shoulders like deep revers, with the contrasting center front filling in the space above like a guingle. For the street the long capes most effectually conceal the figure. If a lacket is preferred it should be a reefer in shape.

If accustomed to wearing skirts held up by shoulder straps, why certainly continue it now, but do not commence it as a fresh practice, as it will feet the feeb and forces and deep and to be a refer by a precise, as waist or skirt that tips up in front. The last characteristic is fatal to anything like conceal-ment. Correspondents asking for suitable summer maternity gowns will be suswered in

THE EXTREMES OF FASHION

HAPPY MEDIUM DESIGNS

A WALKING or traveling dress of diagonally striped cheviot, in shades of brown flecked occasionally with red and blue threads, will wear for several seasons, and always appear in style, as it is medium in all respects. The bell skirt has an outside hem piped at the top with a tiny fold of brown silk cord, and the jacket bodice has the square fronts to the waist line and pointed back finished in the same manner. The fronts have short, wide revers and full topped sleeves falling over the deep cuffs. A best of the material is worn across the front, and over the close-lining front is deep red surah as a plastron that is slightly shirred at the neck and brought smoothly, yet loosely, down over the close-fitting lining to end under the belt. The lining may hook up or fisten with flat buttons, and the silk plastron has crocheted buttons. If of a thin figure, the plastron may have a knife-plaited ruffle down the center. Many correspondents have asked about an inexpensive fall sait appropriate for general "back" wear, which this will be. A felt hat of brown, brown or red veil, according to the complexion, and four button dark red piqué gloves, gives a simple and striish costume, which in real cold and four button dark red piqué gloves, gives a simple and stylish costume, which in real cold weather needs a tan or golden brown jacket.

A SCHOOLGIRL'S NEEDS

SEVERAL subscribers have recently asked what outlit a girl of sevention should have while attending a finishing school. There are so many classes of such schools that I can are so many classes of such schools that I can only ding to the happy medium, and give an outline of what they demand. After the usual assortment of underwear, shoes, etc., comes a flampel dressing gown or wrapper for room wear only; two school dresses may be of serge and cheviot, as they probably out-wear other woolen materials, and should be made in a simple manner without any trim-ming, unless it be mobair braid or velveteen collars and cuffs. The church dress will be of balles' cloth, or one of the new ottoman of ladies' cloth, or one of the new ottoman weaves, made with a jacket bodice, velvet cuffs, revers and collar, and a plastron of surah, the shade of the cloth or in contrast, this being a wonderful season for a harmonious contrast of materials and colors. The bell skirt has a border of the velvet, and white rib-bon platting, or silk cord is basted in the neck and sleeves. Then comes a simple evening dress for the entertainments and occasional cress for the entertainments and occasional receptions that are held in all schools. This is of soft woolen goods rather than of silk, though if the latter is preferred, have a self-figured China. A pretty woolen crepon in cream, pink, pale blue or yellow can be made over sateen and trimned with two gathered suffice of No. 12 satis rithers a believe of No. 12 satis rithers. ruffles of No. 12 satin ribbon, a bodice of satin, full elbow sleeves having a lace ruffle and bracelets of ribbon, suspenders and shoulder bows of the ribbon and either a bertha ruffle or bretelles of creamy point de Genes lace.

TO COMPLETE THE OUTFIT

A N odd blouse of platid silk, crèpon or Henrictia may be worn with old skirts for intermediate changes, keeping the cloth fresh for really nice occasions. A long alster for the walks that are usually taken as an after break fast exercise, and a jacket for nice wear should be accompanied by a soft felt everyday hat and a more dressy one of felt, velvet and feathers. Fabric or heavy Biarritz lamb gloves will be for everyday wear four-button pioné feathers. Fabric or heavy Biarritz lamb gloves will be for everyday wear, four-button piqué or glacé kid for church, and sixteen-button suéde for the evening dress. Black ties and hose will be worn with the evening gown or suéde shoes to match the dress and colored lisle thread hose. Aprons are out of style, but neat white lawn or mainsook aprons are always pretty and womanly to look upon, and save a dress more than we think without a trial. Do not encourage the wearing of jewelry, except a silver or gold pin, among achoolgirls even when it is allowed. Impress upon them, and all girls for that matter, the necessity of givall girls for that matter, the necessity of giv-ing their clothes care if they expect to look nent and get a reasonable amount of wear out of them, remembering, to alter a saying, that cleanliness and order are next to godliness. Above all, do not sacrifice health and comfort to the desire for dress,

SOME DRESSES FOR THE HOUSE

By Isabel A. Mallon

woman, but simply makes her look more majestic, while on the short, stout woman it seems to take away from the dumpy look and gives her an air of grace that she does not possess in a short skirt.

THE VARIOUS DESIGNS LIKED

A LMOST all the house gowns of this year show the graceful Wattenu back, the smooth-fitting sides and the jacket fronts; that is, a jacket front extending the full length of the gown and permitting wide revers to come out over the shoulder. Much ingenuity is shown in the mode of arranging the sleeves, and their picturesqueness tends greatly to add to the good style of the gown. What is known as the English cut is frequently noted in house gowns—i. e., they are cut out enough to give freedom to, and to display the throat, while a deep full of lace outlines the shape. Very long sleeves of lace, outside the close-fitting sleeve, falling far down on the gown, are made of lace flounces, and really add very much to the general effect. A bright woman who wears many house gowns, says that she never permits an evening dress to disappear from among her belongings without first find-ing out whether there is not a bit of trimming, or ribbon, or lace, or passementeric that may be used on a dress exclusively intended for

THE MATERIALS USED

THEY are of all kinds and conditions. A Your gown may be the simplest of cash-mere or the most magnificent of brocade and nere or the most magnificant of brocade and velvet, and all minglings of stuffs are per-mitted because the house gown is counted as unique in the wardrobe, and upon it is possible what would be called eccentricities in other religious. The contribution in other toilettes. The soft, clinging Henrietta cloths, especially in black—for black is very popular this year, the suiting that has in it a mixture of silk and wool, silk, satins or velveteen, not to mention real velvet (if one has the result) of County was the treal. wealth of Crusus) may be used. Frequently the black tea-gowns have a dash of some color on them, again they are all black, or they are trimmed with a course lace that may be either white or black. One can have the white lace put on at first, and when one tires of it the black can be assumed, producing the always refined and most fashionable all-black

A VERY BECOMING HOUSE GOWN

VERY good idea of a house dress that, while it looks extremely smart, is in reality comparatively inexpensive, is shown in Fig. 1. By preference I have given the back view, so that the amateur dressmaker may see exactly how it is arranged. The material see exactly how it is arranged. The material used for this is a warm brown cashmere almost matching the hair of the wearer. In front the gown is fitted to the figure, turns off in revers, faced with yellow silk to display a smocked front of yellow silk apparently confined by a loose girdle of brown passementerie, in which is set imitations of yellow topazes. Further down on each side are knots of brown velvet ribbon, tied before they are placed in position, and then sewed down to place as if they were appliquéd on the material. The sleeres are full, fluffy ones drawn in just below the elbow to deep cuffs of the silk, overlaid with rows of passementerie. A pretty yoke effect is produced by plaited folds of the silk that come to a V in the center of the back, permitting a section of the trimming to be set that come to a V in the center of the back, permitting a section of the trimming to be set in there. The high collar is of the brown material, overlaid with the decoration, and with a resette of the brown velvet ribbon, quite narrow, at one side. A strip of passementerie across the back conceals the joining of the Wattesu fold, which is carefully laid, and, while not caught to position, still does not flare untidily, but instead gracefully down into the abort train. into the short train.

ANOTHER STYLE OF HOUSE DRESS

ANOTHER STYLE OF HOUSE DRESS

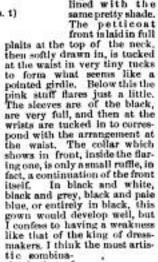

A MUCH simpler house dress, that is simpler in effect, but one which will commend itself to busy women who yet went to look dainty and pretty at all hours of the day, is pictured at Fig. 2. The material used is a light-weight cloth of a deep mode shade that is calculated not to show wear and tear very easily. The skirt portion is quite plainly nucle and finished about the edge with a box-plaited frill of the same fabric. The plainly needs and finished about the edge with a box-plaited frill of the same fabric. The bodice fits closely in the back and is opened slightly in front, where it is buttoned with small, flat green buttons. A pointed girdle of green velvet confines it at the waist and fastens it at the back, the fastening being concealed by long green velvet ribbons that fall over the train. The collar is a high one of the green velvet ribbon. The sleeves are full on the shoulders, gathered in just below the clows, and each caught by a resette of green velvet ribbon, while below that they shape to the arms and are buttoned for quite a distance with green velvet buttons. The bodice decowith green velvet buttons. The bodice deco-ration is a full frill of broad velvet ribbon starting from the shoulders, so that it gives the epaulette effect, and then it is narrowed down to the waist in cascade fashion. In the simplest of materials this dress would have a dainty air, and somehow it seems especially to belong to the energetic housekeeper who carries her account book in her hand.

WHAT SOMEBODY INQUIRES

OMEBODY wants to know exactly what I mean by the very broad revers. And so it seems best to show them. The gown on which they are illustrated is No. 3, and gives one of the best ideas of the favorite black combinations that I have seen. The material used is black Henrietta cloth, and the mean test if its Princers one fitted close to the gown itself is a Princess one fitted close to the figure and cut away sharply in front to show the under gown, or, as fashion-able dressmakers call it, petticoat of pink mousseline de soie. The revers which extend from a short distance above the waist flare far out on to the sleeves, and are faced with a heavy grained pink silk; the high flaring collar in harmony with the revers being of the black lined with the tion is that of black and pink. Pale silvergray, with delicate lilac, or a lovely shade of old rose, with pale olive, makes a pleasing com-bination if it is desirable to to have a more elaborate teagrown.

A PRINCESS HOUSE GOWN (Illus. No. 3)

A FEW SUGGESTIONS

IT is possible that the average woman in looking at the pictures or reading descriptions of house dresses is inclined to think that they are very elaborate, and she cannot compass the making of one. And it is just here she makes her mistake. The simplest of all designs, the princess, may, if it is properly fitted, have hanging lace sleeves added to it, have knots of ribbon here, and a bit of trim-ming there, until it rivals in magnificence a house gown which is much more claborate in cut. It is in knowing how to put the deco-ration on, it is in giving an individuality to your house dress, that makes it becoming, and I do think that as it is the people we love whom we see at home, it is more than worth while to pay due attention to the gown that is to be worn before them.

A FEW LAST WORDS

THINK if one says a thing long enough, in time it gets to have its effect. Not once or twice, but so many times have I appealed to that dear general woman all over the world who is your friend and mine, to do just one thing—to make herself look charming in one thing—to make herself look charming in her home and then she will be able to keep the home people there. In my own mind I confound anarchy with untidy wrappers, frowsy hair, or else that which is put in papers. No bone will be dainty and sweet unless its mistress first sets the example, and though her house gown may be of the plain-est of fabrics, If it suits her and her sur-roundings it is in most perfect taste. We women are apt

We women are apt to pride ourselves on being able to do so much nowadays. I think the best thing we can do is to make a charming home and fill it with happy, contented people. This was never done by an untidy woman. The woman who does not respect her own self sufficiently to alself sufficiently to ni-ways want to look well, will never sur-round herself with people who give her the honor due her. So you see, quite irre-spective of absolute economy I think there are better res-sons for the wearing of a house gown, and so I have given them to you. A man would laugh at the mixing of fashion and preaching, but we women do not. We know that many a gown has told its owner's story, and, my dear general woman, what I want is that your house gown shall tell a story of contentment and or contentment and love—each one the best thing in the world to bave. That sounds like an Irish bull, but I once kissed some-body who had kissed the Blamey stone.

HERE can be no doubt of the general liking for scarlet this season. It is used for linings, season. It is used for linings, for decorations, and in every way possible, and, by possible I mean in every way in which it is harmonious. This scarlet is not a dull or a dingy shade, it does not tend in the least toward Magenta, but is absolutely pure red, that being the color for which a baby will stretch out, which will enrage a wild bull, and which savages are said to admire. Artists say that this liking for scarlet in its perfect purity is an evidence of a healthful condition of the eyes, and shows a return to what might of the eyes, and shows a return to what might be called natural artistic taste. Be this as it may, the knot of scarlet on the black hat, the may, the knot of scarlet on the black hat, the bright scarlet lining in the long coat, the warm looking coat of scarlet serge, the hat for young people of bright red felt, decorated with red velvet and red feathers, and the evening gown of rich red groe-grain, with a decoration of red velvet and red chiffon, prove most decidedly that not only is red approved by the artists and the dressmakers, but that womankind appreciates it and gives it the place of honor that is its due. So it deserves to have said of it, as did a small girl learning her first French sentences, happy in a red frock, a red cloak and a red hat, "Vive la Rouge!"

THE proper handkerchief to carry with a tailor-made suit is of fine cambric in a solid color; blue, pink, lavender, gray or brown, with lines of white across it, having a border that is hemstitched, and in one corner the wearer's initials simply embroidered in white cotton. These are not expensive, wash well and seem in perfect harmony with a cloth gown.

FOR traveling wear a long, full, circular cloak of checked cheriot lined with a color corresponding with the cloth, and having a hood pointed and lined with silk, in fact, a regular monk's hood, is in vogue. This is commended because, while it is sufficiently warm, it can easily be laid aside, and resumed when the car is aver, or under heartel. when the car is over- or under-heated.

A VERY jaunty jacket that, while fitting the figure just as closely as does the Eton one, is yet a little longer, is known as the "Patrol." It has each seam braided and a high, rolling collar, while the fronts of it, fastening with "frogs," allow just an edge of a silk shirt to be visible.

THE various browns in cordurey cloth are liked for medium length winter cloaks; they are usually trimmed with brown fur, and, if the design permits it, rosettes or ribbon ends, not too long, of brown velvet ribbon, are ar-ranged upon them.

WOMEN who admire fans—and where is the one who doesn't?—will be inter-ested in knowing that the most valuable fan in the world is the property of the Baroness James de Rothschild; it is one painted by Watteau in his best style, and there is no doubt of its being absolutely genuine. How many people realize that the entire part of a fun is seldom made in the same place? In some parts of France whole villages are given over to making pearl sticks, while the leaf part will be made in districts many miles away.

A VERY pretty skirt is made of soft black siik, American silk, by the way, with a pinked flounce of yellow, overlaid with a dapery of black lace, caught here and there with a rosette of black ribbon. Women who like white petticoats, and who realize the damage done lace when it visits the laundry, are adopting the English fashion of trimming them with a fell of darket modification in the part of the significant countries. them with a frill of dotted muslin that is not hemmed, but has tiny points buttonholed about the lower edge.

THERE has been found nothing prettier for an evening cape than the long one of white cloth with the three shoulder capes overtopping it, each one bordered with a band NOVEL brooch shows a bar of dull gold with a serpent of green enamel writhing about it.

THE house gown continues to be after the style of the Empire, with a very high belt arranged either in ribbon fashion, or with a huge rosette concealing its fastening. The neck is cut out so that the throat shows, but the sleeves are invariably long; these, of course, was he as fareign as a scale; the soft a not mny be as fanciful as possible, but I do not advise a very full sleeve if one's shoulders are decidedly broad.

THOSE who do not find the hair rolled off the face becoming, are having their bangs cut in a short fluffy fringe that, while it softens the face, does not give the vulgar look of the deep, full bang, which completely hides the

THE faced shoe is rapidly gaining followers; though how one could follow a shoe is rather funny. People who complain of the trouble of sewing on buttons will now have the pleasure of finding exactly how difficult it is to keep shoe laces in order, and how certain they are to break when least expected and

A FELT hat that has the stamp of a famous A FELT hat that has the stamp of a famous milliner upon it is of black felt after what is known as the "boat shape;" that is, low, with a carling brim and rather pointed in front, where there is a knot of emerald green velvet, and from it stand up two stiff, black wings. For evening bonnets, a great many of black jet with underlinings of yellow velvet are noted, and will, it is likely, prove nonular. popular.

THE white fillets, so often spoken of, will obtain all during the season for evening wear; they are excessively becoming to young women, but I cannot commend them to women upon whose faces time has traced any SOFT felt hats of checked tweed with a plain D ribbon band about them and a wing at one side are particularly liked for rainy weather.

IT is predicted that the for coats will be longer and looser this season, while coats lined and trimmed with for, follow the same

A FOOT trimming liked for house dresses is of wood crope, exactly matching in color the material upon which it is; this is gathered at intervals, to form a sort of shell, and then it is knotted. As the fabric is soft, it easily lends itself to this arrangement. Bythe-by, the same arrangement in chiffon is noted on an evening dress.

MOST of us remember when a long, full, MOST of us remember when a long, full, black velvet circular was part of a bride's trousseau. In days gone by, silk velvet was invariably used for this, and in many a household mother's circular, after being made into short coats and bonnets, did duty as belts and girdles, rosettes and bows. The long velvet circular is again the fashion, and in Paris it has a special vogue given it. The collar is usually a high one, lined either with far or feathers, while long, broad satin ribbon ties confine it at the throat. Occusionally elaborate jet trimmings are put down the front of these circulars, but if the material used is rich, the best dressmakers prefer that it should be untrimmed. be untrimmed.

FUR muffs will be larger this season than before, but the dainty little confections made of velvet, ribbon and fur, decorated with lace, feathers or flowers, are excessively small, and really only cover the finger-tips; they, of course, match either the bonnet or the wrap, and are only intended for use at some afternoon function or at a matinee, when con wishes to be very much dressed. one wishes to be very much dressed.

O BCHIDS, tulips, roses or pansies made of velvet and colored to imitate nature are liked on large hats having heavy decorations of feathers. Not more than one flower, if it is a large one, is used, and that is arranged so that it peeps out from a dark, downy nest of fluffiness and gives the much-desired bit of

THE rather heavy white kid gloves, undressed, will be worn all winter with the tailor-made suits. They somehow look in keeping with the cloth, and that is the reason, and surely a very good one, for the favor shown them.

SMALL bonnets of scarlet felt, trimmed with D black velvet and black tips, are much liked, and are generally becoming to women who have but little color in their faces.

THE bag veil, that is, the one draped under L the chin, continues to be liked, but in ar-ranging it one must be sure to fasten the end smoothly at the back, so that a lump of lace which is always awkward looking, does not result. Women of good taste prefer quieter veils than many of those shown.

THE great demand for hand work L handkerchiefs, and all pieces of under-wear, should prove a boon to the woman-who knows how to sew, and wishes to make money. Sewing such as is desired cannot be money. Sewing such as is desired cannot be gotten in the big shops, and the smaller ones, where it is furnished, are constantly in search of those women who sew a "long seam" finely, or hemstitch a hem as it should be.

PRETTY petticost is made of white A challe, with red berries and olive leaves upon it. The deep flounce has two insertions of Valenciennes lace, and is finished with a deep frill of it. As a heading to the lace is a quille of olive ribbon about an inch wide, caught here and there in a fantastic way.

ON the large red felt hat, that belongs by courtesy to the young girl, the Mephisto feathers do not appear; instead, stiff satin or weivet ribbon is wired to take the place of them, and produces the same effect by the weird ar-rangement. Wise mothers know that feathers soon grow limp when much wear is given thing sticks to it and, of course, it frays right out; besides, it lets the skirt spread and gives it a bad shape; doesn't hold it firm as the braid does. I stick to the old-fashioned Goff's Braid that our mothers and grandmothers used; it's light, clean, lasts longer and doesn't cost so much. The velveteen is going out of style, too, so the best dressmakers say."

Goff's is the recognized leader among braids, and is well known by every retailer in the country. It commands the highest price on account of its merit. For binding and facing ladies' dresses "GOFF's has no equal. Look for this clasp. No other braid has it.

DAINTY COSTUMES FOR THE EVENING

By Isabel A. Mallon

ITH the winter evenings comes the musicale, the party of games or the homedance, and for them every girl wants to look her best. This is a desire that wise mothers encour-age. And, by-the-by, the age. And, by-the-by, the wise mother will not only see that her daughter has a pleasant time, but she will form part of that pleasant time, but she will form part of that pleasant time herself, by being so agreeable that she will make herself a necessity, and wherever there is something gay and lively gotten up, they will want her to help them along; for it takes a mother to start anything going, to bring together the people who are in harmony, and to make the coach of pleasure go as easily as if it were on wheels of velvet.

Much license is permitted in the arrangement of an evening dress, especially when it is intended for a young woman; little picturesque effects may be produced, dainty frills and flounces put here and there, and material that seems merely ordinary may be developed that seems merely ordinary may be developed into a gown that appears like the clouds itself—it is so light and fleecy.

MATERIALS IN VOGUE FOR EVENING

THE various light gauzes, tulles, net and all the flary-like looking stuffs are devoted to the young girl in society. In making a tulle gown, it must be remembered that its fullness is part of its beauty, and that after the two outer skirts of tulle, which should be rather time, there is one of coarser tulle, then one of net and then the foundation, which may, by-the-by, be of silk, or if that expense is not cared for, a dull, somewhat stiff net lining may be chosen that will not show through the thin fabrics.

A ROSE-BUD COSTUME (Illus. No. 1)

In wool materials the fashion of last seasonthat of using broadcloth, is likely to obtain even more than it did last year, though cashmere, Henrietta cloth and all of the soft wool fabrics will, of course, have a decided vogue. Velvet, unless it should be in the form of a bodice or a jacket, is not considered in good taste for young women, and neither is brocade. The soft delaises, which have a little more body than nun's veiling, are noted and developed into exceedingly pretty toilettes. One is illustrated at Fig. 1.

A GRACEFUL ROSE-BUD COSTUME

THE material used for this is a pale, rose colored delaine, the skirt, which tits rather smoothly in front, having just sufficient fullness in the back to make it graceful. At the lower edge is a kilted flounce of pink chiffon, and over this are arranged loops and knots of pink ribbon of a deeper shade. The bodice is high, fits the figure genefully, and has for its decoration a plaited frill of chiffon—each group augh, account agure gracefully, and has for its decoration a plaited frill of chiffon—each group of plaits being caught with a knot of ribbon, the whole strip being worn as a fiche might be, and draped in at the waist, where it is caught by the waist ribbon of pink. The full sleeves are of the chiffon, tied at the chows with a band and knots of ribbon, long gloves of pale, rose-colored undressed kid coming up to meet them. The hair is parted in the center, drawn back in a low knot at the back, where it is fantastically tied with a pink ribbon. This is at once a simple, inexpensive and ex-This is at once a simple, inexpensive and ex-tremely dainty dress, being really just what I call it—a rose-bad gown.

A rose-bad gown is one that in material and design suits a young girl, a combination that is necessary for her to be artistically, which means well dressed.

THE TULLE GOWN

WHITE seems exclusively the color of WHITE seems exclusively the color of the young girl, though it must be confessed that the young matron claims it as her privilege to wear it. The white tulle gown is essentially dainty looking, and, like the favorite doll on the top of the Christmas tree, one is almost afraid to touch the young girl garbed in its purity, and, after all, it seems as if this were right. In rose, pale blue, pale green, lavender, gray, indeed almost every color that is dainty and suitable, tulle gowns are noticed. After one has seen them in all shades one's eyes go back to the all-white costume as the most charming.

Such a costume is pictured at Fig. 2. It is a pure white tulle, and has a very Frenchy trimming in the shape of three rows of narrow satin ribbon ruching at regular intervals above the foot of the skirt. Just near the front are pendant loops of a narrow ribbon, which seems to suggest that the joining might be concealed by them. The bodice is a draped one of white satin, the upper portion of it being of white tulle. This part is arranged in such a way that a V-shaped point is achieved and the pretty, white throat is visible. The sleeves are of the tulle, come well below the elbow, and are finished with a frill of the satin ribbon similar to that of the skirt. The bair is parted slightly at one side, crimped and knotted somewhat high on the head. The slippers are of white satin and the stockings of white slik.

In all black, or in lavender, as well as in rose, this gown could be beautifully duplicated, and would certainly be becoming. I especially commend it in black to a fair-haired young matron, and if one were only to have one evening dress it would, in that sombre color without any color, be a toilette that people would not tire of, and which, most important of all, would not make the wearer herself grow weary.

SOME SPECIAL POINTS

SOME SPECIAL POINTS

I'll must be remembered in an evening dress that while, of course, one wishes one's skirts to look well, the greatest attention to detail is paid to the bodice. A fancy exists for draping materials around the waist, especially a the form benefit of the course. ially when the figure is slender, in such a way that no fastening is visible. When this is done the bome dressmaker will be wiscet if she catches the folds here and there on the bodice catches the folds here and there on the bodice lining: let the closing be with hooks and eyes at one side, well under the arm, where the folds lap over sufficiently to hide it. Of course, it will be necessary to fasten this lapping-over place with a pin or two, for although I do not advocate pins on walking costumes, still, it must be confessed that I see where their use comes in on an evening costume, when it would be impossible to place a permanent fastening. Old pictures are copied and original ideas sought for the evening bodice, and the result is that this season, more than ever before, much individuality is seen among them. before, much individuality is seen among them. The woman who is a clever designer berself can do much to assist her friends, and the other woman who has as an acquaintance some well-known artist who will give her ideas for her gown, feels that she possesses a greater jewel than even the most famous one owned by the Queen of England. A dainty bodice is shown in Fig. 3.

THE PICTURESQUE BODICE

THIS bodice is made of pale blue cloth, and THIS bodice is made of pale blue cloth, and dotted with little crescents of black jet, each one being sewed to place separately. The throat is cut out in a pretty, rounded way, and below it falls, from under a fine ruche, a full frill of black lace. The sleeves are high and of the cloth; they are draped in below the elbow to a cuff formed almost entirely of the jet ornaments. Around the waist is worn a high, blue sash, folded somewhat after the Empire style, and tied in long ends and loops at the back. The hair is arranged in the back. The hair is arranged in the regular Grecian fashion—the short bang is crimped, the rest of the hair drawn back and knotted as pictured. A pale blue fillet drawn through it is in stiff loops and ends in front, and has an odd contrast standing beside them-two green and gold beetles. If one wished to be very eccentric, and at the same time copy a com-bination liked by French dressmakemeralda, or rather their imitations, could be used on the blue back ground in place of the jet. This, however, while it is striking, is not a coming, is not a com-bination that one would care to wear often, its very uniqueness making it a bit wearisome. When that word is at-tached to a gown it is a fallows. it is a failure.

THE WHITE THLLE GOWN (Illus. No. 2)

No evening dress is in good taste unless all the small belongings are perfectly fresh. Sins of omission, sins of commission in the way of soiled slippers and gloves, and broken fans, or fillets not properly tied, will completely ruin the prettiest of gowns. The economical girl learns in time to keep her slippers white by rubbing them with a loaf of bread, and she had better be without a fan than to carry a broken one, or one that is soiled. Ganze fans, with imitation ivory sticks. than to carry a proken one, or one that is soiled. Ganze fans, with imitation ivory sticks, either spangled or painted, are pretty and young looking, and may be gotten at small cost. When slippers reach that point of discoloration when bread crumbs and chalk are of no use, then they may be sent to the professional cleaner's, and will come home looking very nearly as good as new. White slippers clean better than any others, and so do white gloves, and for that reason a preference is given to them. Ribbons worn in the hair need to be immaculate, and unless one's hair is very dry, a white ribbon will only do service once. The ribbon used for this purpose is an inch wide, heavy gros-grain or satin, as is most becoming, the satin suiting the black or brown-haired woman rather better than it does a blood. a blonde. Sometimes a very much worn gown is made presentable by fresh belongings, so you see they have their value in more ways than one

I want to say what I think about it. I do approve of girls and boys dancing. I do not believe in late hours; I believe in dances that begin at eight and end at the time when Cinderella fled from the young Prince, and left her slipper behind her. I do not believe in over dressing, but I do believe in making our girls her slipper behind her. I do not believe in over dressing, but I do believe in making our girls have a pride in their appearance. Dancing is a healthful exercise that incites grace, and which keeps young people from some of the very objectionable games that people who do not approve of dancing do not hesitate to in-dulge in. But I say let the dancing be at home—at your girl's home, at her friend's home, and where she will only see people who have the recom-mendation of the mendation of the roof she is under. A jully dance will keep the boys at home; it makes the house cheer-ful; it makes everybody glad and merry, and I think one of the most delightful things I ever saw was a Virginia reel that had at its head a yenemble poet and a great beauty, who in their turn danced to a small girl of fourteen and a boy of twentyone. Somehow all the games in the world never seem to give the pleasure that this does, and properly managed, dancing is the most absolutely innocent form of amuse-ment. But I con-fess I believe in making a dance one where the old and young meet together. To the people who will disagree with me in this opinion I can only say in regard to dancing, "Search the Scripit were possible to estimate it, what do you think would be the money value of a sunny face in a home? By its cheer-ing light how much more work could be accomplished in the same time! How much less real disaster would come from misfor-tunes! History tells of tunes! History tells of more than one important victory gained, or defeat prevented, by the power of a courageous voice. Unwritten history is full of achievements due to the influence of a smile the influence of a smile.

These shortening days, gray with November's proverbial cloudiness, are just the time to study this mathematical problem. Apply a sunny look or so to the vexations of wash-day. See if it will not give you an extra hour of your washer-woman's time—or your own.

Farjeon's dinner of bread and cheese, served with kisses was appetizing as well as nourish-

Farjeon's dinner of bread and cheese, served with kisses, was appetizing as well as nourishing. There was no need to buy bitters nor cod liver oil at the drug store. And your tough meat or scorched pudding need not spoil a dinner seasoned with merriment. The broken dish will be less likely to be followed by another if the nerves are toned by a cheerful word. Look at it from a purely commercial standpoint and see if it would not "pay." A bearty laugh is often as good for a dyspeptic as pepsin, and much cheaper. True, it will cost something of self-control and endurance, but yet the balance will be in favor of the effort. Your particular woes are so great and your bardens so heavy that "no mortal could be cheerful." Tell them to me, and I will match each one with a greater which has been borne with a brave-secrecy and a shining countenance, under whose beams other men and women have found themselves relieved of their lesser sorrows, never dreaming of the stricken beart at wheen wereneaghable first. their lesser sorrows, never dreaming of the stricken heart at whose unquenchable fires they were warming their own cold souls.

I Wisii to suggest a few amosements for children.

For a wee child try a tack hammer, tacks and a piece of pine board. Seat him by a table in his high chair, pat a bit of while woolen stuff under the board to deaden sound and he will be happy even if he harts himself at first; a line or two with pencil will teach him some idea of order in driving the tacks in.

For older children, but them collect cuts of houses, shops, churches, towers, etc., of uniform size, say from two to four inches high, according to the capacity of the norsery for sterage, and some pixe blocks. A boy can collect all he will want from the floor of a carpenser shop. The cuts are pasted on the sides of the blocks, the older children or friends shaping the wood for steeples or chimneys. A box of cheap paints is another branch of the employment to color the buildings, spools may be sawn in two to hold they evergeren trees, or stiff little trees may be made by shaving down a pine stick, the shavings being left on to form a shape like the Norway surnor; these, painted green, must be kept in a separate box. When sufficient blocks have been prepared, towns are built, streets, squares, or detached bouses with trees. There is no limit to this direction.

The children save their pennies and buy a Nosh's Art, giving them another building or circus parade.

The collection can go on all the time, but the making of a town had better be reserved for wet days—days when one is poorly and must stay indoors. Do not have all the playthings out at once, and, above all things, teach children that their happiness and employment one come to them through their own resources, and need not cost much.

Little girls love to be bosy just as do the boys. My little girls beyen to make breast, two little havee, at six years old, and made cakes for their ten-parties, mossering by speconfuls. At four years old girls will seen inless the payen made takes for their ten-parties, mossering by speconfuls. At four years old girls will seen including the short pieces neatily fitte say one will wish to repest.

THANKFUL MOTHER

These suggestions will be welcomed in many a nursery, I am sure. And the principle that the child must find contentment in very simple ways and must find resources within himself upon which to draw for his occupa-tions, is one which every mother should use in the training of her children.

CHOULD there be nobody to tell in a better way about a magazine club, I am giad to have an opportunity. Last Jassiary I became interested in such a club carried on by four young men, and when one left, I accepted the invitation to take his place.

— A" boys "The ——" and passes it to "R" "R" "The —— Magazine" and passes it to "R" "C;" "C;" "The —— Monthly" and passes it to ms. I buy."—— I made pass it to "A." Each one bas a book about a week. If there is a good understanding between all the members no one will have more than one book at a time. In this way I read four papers and only gay for one, in this way I read four papers and only gay for one. It is would be a delightful way to make a social club. This would be a delightful way to make a social club and give one a chance to discuss the marious articles. I am one of the working girls, and my friends are in the same sions with ms. We often call attention to the things that please us best. Though our club is very quiet, we find it a very pleasant one.

Eve.

I wish all the young men and young women in our shops were members of just such clubs, Their conversation would be less uncomfort-able to listen to when one is waiting for "change." You have outlined your plan so well that I feel sure it will be copied,

A LTROUGH I cannot count myself as one of the A "staid and respectable matrons." yet I like to think and feel that what I read on this page is for ma, too. I readily do not suppose that any one can possibly know how much good her own particular letter is going to do to some one, but I know that I have gotten some of the brightest views of life from some of the letters, and you know that is what we want most of all. Now, I'm only a girl, but I think I know a great deal about girls, though pechaps I'm mistaken there; and I have something I want you to tell all the mothers for me. Tell them so they will stop and think a mousent. You know girls are advised to have mother for their confidence, and there was never wiser, better advice given. But, Dear Amnt Pattence, won't you tell the mothers that that len't all; that the mothers must be keepers of the confidence intrusted to them, and encourage it, for you know a confidence is a very deficular little plant, and the waste the susshine of sympathy before it can open.

I sometimes think the mothers are perhaps a little mistake they lose the jewel they prize the most, the daughter's confidence.

It is the first thing a girl thinks of, to go and tell mother; but If mother is but glanning her work, or worried about semething class and can't listen, or, perhaps, is a little impatient—but a little, she thinks." I can't tell mother now," and she goes away to worry it out by herself; and there is such a feeding of lonellness in it to think that perhaps mother wouldn't care to hear it, after all.

I know, to the older heads, some of the trities that fill up a young life, and are so much to it at the time, must seem very foolish, but it will pay them to listen to it all, and sympathize with them, and then it so casy to lead the daughter when you have hold of her hand. You have told it to them yourself in the best way and I endowed all you any most.

You have told it to them yourself in the best way, and I endorse all you say most

SHOULD the pride of parents come in between two loving hearts?

No; but the "two loving hearts" should be No; but the "two loving hearts" should be sure that the parents have not some good reason for coming "between" them. There is nothing to a daughter more valuable than her parents' loving guardianship. If sometimes they seem over-cautious, she should respect their solicitude and heed their counsels. If, after a respectful hearing and patient waiting for a reasonable time, her love is justified by her lover's conduct also may be here of according to the conduct when the page is the conduct as the may be interested. by her lover's conduct, she may, being of age, decide the question for berself, and do what is possible to win her parents to her view of the case. I think third consinship need not be an insuperable obstacle to marriage if all other circumstances are favorable.

D<sup>0</sup> you all know that the air is the cheapest and pur-est medicine we can purchase? Why, then, are we so saving of it? I know it is very hard to realize how quickly the pure air is breathest up, and for that reason it seems impossible to keep the rooms full of pure air, especially where there are several persons to help con-sume it.

it seems impossible to keep the rooms fall of pure air, especially where there are several persons to belp consume it.

Every morning let the outside doors be opened, and fan the air vigorously with the door. Serve the living rooms this way, or open the windows if there are no outside doors. Then close them and rush up the fires, and how nice and comfortable one will feet. If the sleeping rooms open from the living rooms, or there are beds in the living rooms, open the doors for a few minutes before retring, concetable in the living rooms, open the doors for a few minutes before retring, especially if there has been company in dusting the evening. One certainly cannot feel resided by breathing secund-handed air, and most probably will not sleep at all. During stekness pure air is the greatest essential toward regularing bealth. Warm rooms, if well ventilated, are nice to sleep in; still, I think cool rooms are better. The windows can be kept open during the day, and a little at night, if not too severe a wised is blowing. Every one airs their sleeping rooms during the day, I suppose, and to do this satisfactority have the windows half open, not an factor two. Our breath is absorbed by the thick compares during the firstness of the good searching becase during the firstness at least to fill them with pure air for the night. Buring the summer the pure air is most generally allowed to visit you; but in ould weather, "Oh, how could to have a window open;" But do you know that the cold, impure air becomes chilly, and feels colder than the cold, pure air, which makes our frest to warm up quickly, and why not to give life to our bodies, and keeps a rosy hue on our cheeks. Colds are not caught by breathing cold pure air air night or at any time.

A crusade against foul air would be a great

A crusade against foul air would be a great help to good morals. Men and women are poisoned through their lungs, and are in greater danger from lack of food for their lungs than for their stomachs. Some one has expressed a wish that as soon as air had been once breathed it would grow black. What a sight What a sight our rooms would often be!

D ID anything practical ever result from the "lady help" movement which was inaugurated in Lou-don, England, several years ago? ANXIOUS WORKER. ANXIOUS WORKER.

I believe the experiment proved almost a total failure, from the lack of practical knowl-edge exhibited by those who sought and ob-tained employment, and from the fact that most of the applicants for work desired only to engage as companions. A similar plan has been adopted in another one of the English cities, and its first report, which has recently been published, is a little more encouraging. I fear, however, that until there is a decided change in this domestic service problem, and until young girls, both here and abroad, are tanglet the dignity of labor, there will con-tinue to be trouble.

There has recently been a plan of household help started in a western city, which is being watched with interest by women in the east. Two young girls have organized an Emergency Bureau, which is intended to bring together women who need help in their homes, and intelligent girls or women who are willing to give such help at stated hours of the day, and for a certain amount of pay. Whenever assistance is needed about the house the Bureau will undertake to supply the person to do that work intelligently and well.

I LIKE to allow my children to invite some of their playmates to come and spend the day with them on their birthdays. But I do not want the guests to bring presents. How can I avoid it without seeming rude? The custom has become so universal that persons feel they must, whether it is convenient or not, and I know there are many times when it is not convenient for those tiving in the country to go to town or to take time to make something, even where financial reasons would not prevent.

If, M.

If your friends know that you cannot allow your children the pleasure of such a birthday party, if it involves such conventional gift giv-ing, I am sure they would refrain from it, and you can, surely, tell them so in some way which will neither be nor seem rude. Do not display the gifts received; it might be well not to give the things which the family have pre-pared until after the party, so that the interest will not center about them.

WILL you let me say a few words in behalf of the poor men who seem to have no rights in their own homes, according to "B." in August Journal.

It seems to me a husband and father has almost as much right in his own house as a wife and mother. If he wants to bring home a friend to dinner, I think he ought to be allowed to do it without first asking permission. I would advise "B" to book after her busband's meals, and have them so if he were to bring hume the Car of all the Russias she could meet him with a smile of welcome. I know that, if not as chisorate as a formal dinner, still what was ready for my husband was good enough for any other man. From my own experience, I know it does not require either great wealth or a great strain on the nerves of a wife and mother to have a bouse and table so that any one can come in and be welcome. It only requires a little cure on the part of a wife, and to feel that her busband is the one man in the world before all others to get a dinner for, or anything else.

Yours must be an extraordinary home, with

Yours must be an extraordinary bome, with an elastic table and a self-feeding larder. Your husband may own a carriage; if it is good enough for you it is "good enough for any woman." And, perhaps, you ought to feel free to invite a friend to drive with you. But if the limits of the carriage have been reached by the friends or the family already scated in the carriage, no amount of good intention can help a disturbance. Either your drive will be spoiled by great discomfort, or some one must go without. No one should object to sharing a meal with a friend, but the friend may properly object to being placed in the position of one who crowds the carriage, or turns out some one else. The home is the joint home of husband and wife, and consideration each for the other is a necessity. The husband must not fail to consider the circumstances of his household, nor must the wife Yours must be an extraordinary home, with stances of his household, nor must the wife trespass upon the family purse, by too much company. Wives sometimes introduce the in-convenient guest themselves.

I SHOULD like to appeal to your fellow feeling as a woman; as a class, we have been horrfily wronged just lately by a hardened cynic. Let me explain! At the international Congress of Experimental Philosophy in London, one of the topics under consideration was "The boreshtility of Woman." During the discussion, a certain professor made some starting revelations in regard to the long-established theory of woman's superiority in endurance. He granted that women seemed to hear pain better than most men, but he gare as the solution to this remarkable fact that we poor feminine creatures had dull sensibilities and, consequently, feeling less, apparently endured more. This dear man goes on to say: "What has ledd to the bedief in the greater sensibility of woman is her greater trittability and freer expression of feeling. Women team by their own experience the power they possess through learn, and hence they were from policy, weep made, and weep at he right time." Now, does this not make your blood buil? I wish I could tell this professor about one woman I know, who suffere everything, every humiliation and grief of sont, as well as the keenest physical pala, and yet endores and lives on, helping others to be happier. There are many lives like this, are there not? It seems to me that the more animal and the less intellectual say one is the less are they able to bear affilied, physical or otherwise. He we not know that it takes less to kill a dog than it does to kill a homan being? Will power has everything to do in most crises. This theory would spoil the notion that woman being inferior mentally to mas is, consequently, less succeptible to pain. For being slupid, she should have been exthect long ago.

It is the first place, we do not know to ever would have been exthect long ago.

Is it worth while to combat such views? In the first place, we do not know each well enough to judge. Who can tell how much men suffer? Can it be weighed or measured? Men and women are alike, and they are unlike. It is useless to try to say which is best. Endurance and patience in the mother desrends to the son, as well as to the daughter. Indolence, inefficiency, cowardice, may be in-herited by the daughter from either parent.

NOT long ago I was reading something in the Journ-Nall about "The Seidsh Hustand," and I wondered if we when were not in a measure to blame for the selfshness or thoughtlessness of our husbands.

Is not this a failt that gradually develops? Who ever heard of a loving newly-married couple that the histhand was not willing to sacrifice everything for the happiness of his hride? Sometimes, in the first years of wedded life, the wife is anxious to bear her share of sacrifice, and does much more until the husband forgets that everything is expected of him.

happiness of als bride? Sometimes, in the first years of wedded life, the wife is anxious to bear her share of sacrifice, and does much more until the husband forgets that everything is expected of him.

Here is an illustration of my meaning: The husband comes home from basiness and finds the wife suffering with nervous beadache. With sympathy written in every line of his face, be will say: "Darfing, I will stay at home from the clock, to-alght, if you wish!" "No. Jim, I know you want to go: I will be all right alone." This, perhaps, is repeated a score of times, and then who is most to biame if the husband takes his hat some night with a "Sorry your bread aches again, Milly! Don't sit up for me. I may be late!" and away to the cloth be goes, with never n thought of staying at home. Would it not have been better if the wife had said: "Yes: it will be very nice to have you at home. I am sure my head will not ache quite so hadly if you were been."

Let a man know his sacrifice has made the wife happier or more comfortable, and he will be anxious to repeat it. I think it is in our power to change the husband's faults to virtues, but it must be done with their said gentleness.

You are right: the lightic which hereomes

You are right; the habits which become annoying, and even those which give pain to our conjunious, creep upon us often very insidiously. It is as true of wives as of husbands; of women, as well as men. But 1 must confess that a great deal of what is called selfishness in husbands is the natural outcome of a kind of coddling which a young wife is often happy in lavishing upon her hero. If love were always wise, it would regard the future good, as well as the present pleasure of the loved one, and yet who is ready to put himself under bonds to keep within1certain limits of kindness and caressing?

o not over-water your plants at this time of the year. There is generally but little sunshine, consequently evaporation will take place slowly. As a general thing, few plants are in active growth during this month, and such plants should never be watered freely. Watch closely for insects; the atmosphere of most living rooms is favorable to their rapid increase, and plants will soon be covered with them unless they are well watched. If you find green lice, apply an infusion of sulpho-tobacco scap. Do this as soon as the aphides are discovered. In fighting insects on plants it always pays to act promptly, and to be thorough. If you discover a red spider, and you probably will find hundreds of them on the lowerside of yellow leaves, if you look for them, you can be sure that the air of the room is too dry for the health of the plants. Syringe them every evening, and use water freely. Remember that nothing will rout this pest so effectually as water. Keep your plants as moist as they like to be kept, and you will seldom have any trouble with the spider.

DO not apply fertilizers to any plant not making growth. This is a very im-portant thing to remember in the culture of plants. Many persons make the mistake of plants. Many persons make the mistake of applying manure to plants at a stand-still, hoping to start growth. They are always injured by this practice. Wait until the plant has begun to grow, then apply your fertilizer. Keep the curtains away from the glass at the windows where your plants are; there is so little sunshine at this senson of the year that the plants should be allowed the full benefit of all there happens to be. And besure to open the window at the top every warm and sunny day, and let the air come in. Plants breathe, and they want fresh air. They must have it in order to do well.

It will be out of the question to give your plants as much fresh air as they have been accustomed to having, and the atmosphere will not have that moisture in it which plants find so necessary to their welfare, but by opening the windows every day and sprinkthe plants thoroughly at night, and keeping them away from fires, we can gradually accustom them to the change from out to indoors in such a manner as to weaken them but little. Generally, plants are left out as long as it is safe to do so. When a frosty night comes along they are brought into the sitting-room, and there they are subjected to such violent changes of conditions that the wooder is that they survive. The windows such violent changes of conditions that the wonder is that they survive. The windows are seldom opened during the day, and they pine for fresh air. The room is kept so warm that all moisture is taken from the air and they are stimulated to make a rapid and un-healthy growth. It is not at all to be won-dered at that so few collections of house plants afford satisfaction. The wonder is that they give any flowers. If possible, keep them in a room without a fire until really cold wea-ther comes. There is not half so much danther comes. There is not half so much dan-per of their freezing as there is of their being killed by too much beat. And be very sure to see that they do not suffer from lack of mois-ture in the air. This can be prevented by sprinkling them thoroughly at least once a day.

BE sure to provide a goodly quantity of bulbs for winter use. In selecting hyacinths, choose single sorts rather than double ones, as they generally bloom better. Get some of the Romans, as they are free bloomers and really more graceful than the better known resisting. varieties. Florists have made them so popular of late that they are in great demand. For cut flower work they are very fine.

The polyanthus parcissus is a most desirable winter-flowering plant. It is much prettier than the tulip. Do not fail to plant at least half a dozen of them. And be very sure to plant a good many Easter lilies. I get more satisfaction from this flower than from any other bulb that can be forced into bloom in winter. With proper care, if you have good strong bulbs to begin with there is scarcely a possibility of failure. Nothing presents a finer appearance in the window than one of these plants in bloom. One of the magnifi-cent trumpet-shaped flowers, literally running over with sweetness, is worth a hundred in ferior flowers.

In planting bulbs for winter use, be sure to pot them in a rich, resilow soil, to water well at time of planting, but not after that until they begin to grow, and to put the pots away in some cool, dark place for roots to form be-fore the plants are subjected to the influences of light and heat. Follow these rules and you will have success. Ignore them, and the result will probably be failure.

DECORATIONS FOR THANKSGIVING

HRYSANTHEMUMS are the most suit-HRYSANTHEMUMS are the most suitable flowers we have for use at the Thanksgiving dinner, they are in keeping with the season. They and the "day we celebrate" are in touch with each other. Nothing can be more appropriate than a great bowl of these flowers, cut with long stems. Let white and yellow kinds predominate, using a few of the dark maroon ones to give tone to the lighter colors. If more than one table is used in the room, or the table is a large one, as it is likely to be in homes where the day is kept in its old-fashioned way, there might be a bowl filled with flowers of but one color for each table, or for the center and ends of the long table.

WHEAT AND OTHER GRASSES

WHEAT AND OTHER GRASSES

A S Thanksgiving Day is really a sort of harvest festival, vases filled with wheat, outs and graceful grasses are quite appropriate, and can be made very effective if tastefully arranged. Never crowd them; allow each kind used to display its individuality. Scarlet rose-baws, or the crimson clusters of the berberry, can be mixed with the yellow grain, and made to heighten the effect. Fruit can be made to take the place of flowers as a decoration for the table with charming color-effects. Great clusters of mountain ash berries can be made to serve as a foundation. Work in among them heads of bearded wheat, and yellow rye or cats. Upon these foundation-colors display your purple and white grapes and ruddy apples and pears. Oranges can be added for the sake of color, but they will hardly be considered worth eating on Thanksgiving Day.

MOUNTAIN ASH AND ALDER BERRIES

P you wish to decorate the room, you can I P you wish to decorate the room, you can produce fine effects with mountain ash berries, or the red alder, which grows plentifolly in most swampy places throughout the north. Work in with these, as a background, branches of evergreen; to relieve the color of evergreen and fruit, use wheat freely. If a sparkling effect is desired, dip wheat heads in a thin solution of gum arabic and sprinkle powdered mice over them. They will glisten in lamp-light as if covered with frost.

One Thanksgiving dinner table, last year.

One Thanksgiving dinner table, last year, beld as a center piece a great pumpkin nest-ling among autumn leaves. After the sub-stantial dishes of the feast had had justice done them, the upper half of the pumpkin was removed, showing a "heart" of luscious fruits and dainty candles.

THE GRAND DUKE JASMINE

NOTHER year's trial of this greatly NOTHER year's trial of this greatly praised plant has convinced me more strongly of its merits. It is much more sure to bloom than the cape jasmine. Its flowers are waxen in texture, ivory white in color, as double as a rose, and possess the rich, heavy fragrance characteristic of all jasmines. Two or three flowers will fill a room with the subtle odor. Small plants flower freely. I have found but one insect on my plants, that the scale. A prompt application of kerosene emulsion soon routed it.

This jasmine likes a rich, light, sandy soil, It should be given good drainage, and watered

THE GRACEFUL EUPATORIM

THIS is one of our best winter-blooming plants. Florists depend on it for white flowers to work up with colored ones in their choicest bouquets; the blossoms are of feathery form, very light and graceful in effect, and therefore very valuable because of their con-trast and the facility with which they har-monize with all other flowers. They are easily grown, any good soil seeming to sait them. Do not give a very sunny location. Water well when making rapid growth and coming into bloom. There are several varieties, not dif-fering so much in the peculiarities of flowers as in the time of blooming. By a careful selection of kinds with reference to their flowering period it is easy to have them all through the winter.

PLANTS FOR HANGING BASKETS

MONG basket plants suitable to culture A. in ordinary windows nothing is better than the othorna, with its peculiar, fleshy foliage and its imminerable little yellow flow-ers, which give it such a bright and cheerful look. Another good hanging plant is exalis roses, with pretty clover-like foliage and clusters of bright pink flowers which are delightfully fragrant. It is almost always in bloom. There are other good plants for langing bas-kets, but I have not mentioned them because flowering plants only were under considera-tion in this article.

HETTIE C.-Apply powdered beliebore while the bushes are wet with dew.

Mes. L. J. Sanus-I would cover the plants with leaves, lightly. Do not smother the plants.

E. A.—Invert a tab or bogshead over your water lilies, and bank around them with leaves or litier.

K. C. J.—You will find petunias, myosotis, lobellas erious and compacts, nemophila and godetia all adapted to culture in a shaded corner.

Miss. E. S. B.—The best white climbing rose is the Raithmore belle. The best red one queen of the prairie. The best time to set them is in spring.

H. W.—After a calla has rested all summer, it should be re-poiled. A correspondent writes that she has need matches in the soil to drive away white worms with good success.

F. B. W.—This correspondent sends a sketch of a plant she would like to get. No one knows what it is in her town. It is circutedrou bulburii. She will find it listed in the catalogues of all prominent dealers.

N. M. C.—I have repeatedly said in this department that I was not familiar with eactus culture, and advised inquirers to write to dealers in those plants. Will those interested please "make a note" of this, and not send any questions to me?

Mas. M. W.—Cut back the roses somewhat this fall. In appling it may be necessary to go over them again and remove weak or decaying branches. The two-best white geraniums for bedding out are condidissima and la cygne, or while seven.

Many T. Hill.—Plant lily of the valley in a moist, semi-shaded place, and do not disturb the roots. After the plants have become well established you can look for good crops of flowers. As "companion" to coonymus would advise ancubs.

J. J. S.—Do not keep the room in which your plants are too warm; get a thermometer and haing it where you can see it easily. Aim to keep the temperature at about 20°; this will be quite warm enough for the human occupants of the room, and plants would do better with five degrees less.

N. A. P.—Your pancy leaves turn brown from rust. You say nothing about the location in which they grow but I imagine it is a dry, sunny one. Am I wrong? Panetes like a cool, alry, built-shaded place. They utili grow well in any good soil that is not heavy with clay. Even clay soils will grow them well if light-send somewhat by mixing in loam, sand, or old manure.

Mas. F.—To grow violets successfully under glass, you must have a cool house for them. They require a low temperature and liberal supplies of air. In a warm, close room the bads will blast, and the red spider attack the plants. In attempting their cultivation, try plants maker than seeds. Sweet peas are not adapted to culture under glass. Only the most skillful growers can succeed with them.

R. H.—In planting pink, yellow and red roses, I would keep each tolor pretty well by itself. Let the yellow ones come between the red and pink ones. Sweet peas are beneated by liquid mnours. The best dark red rose that is hardy at the north, so far as my experience goes, is thesepe the Fourth. Among the hybrid perpetuals, Camille de Rolan is probably the best; it is very dark with a velvety texture.

Mas. C. A. SEELYE—Old abstillion plants are best, as they have more blooming surface. Plants intended for winter flowering ought not to be allowed to blossom in summer. These plants can be kept from year to year. Each spring give them a severe cutting back, and they will put forth any number of new branches. He-pet in September, and shorten the season's growth in some-what. Summer-flowering abultions are best wintered in the cellar.

M. O. M.—The kerosene emulsion so often spoken of in this department is sure to remove small if applied theorosphy, and prepared as advised. I know of nothing so effective. It is true that it is not prepared without some trouble, but those who have choice planes affected by insects will be willing to put themselves to some trouble for the sake of ridding them of pests. If they are not willing to do this they ought to give up growing plants.

JEMBER J. PECK—Tuberoses should be potted early in the season, March of April. They require a rich, light, sandy soil, and considerable heat. Being satives of the south, where the summers are long, we must start them early in order to get them out of the way of freet in fail. The plants can be transferred to the open ground after the weather becomes warm, but I prefer to grow them in pots. If the weather becomes cold and frosty before the flowers are developed, they can be taken to the house to blossom.

PALM—You say that you keep your palm in shade, and unier daily, and the tips of its leaves turn brown and stowly die. Doubtless because you give so much water that the roots are diseased. Finals in the shade do not require water every day. Give less, and see if your plant is not benefited. Small pots are better for flowering plants than large ones, because a large amount of soil encourages development of branches, wille restriction of the roots has a tendency to produce flowers rather than branches.

Mas. F. S.—I would not advise anyons to attempt the manufacture of a fernery in these days when it is possible to buy them so changly. A home-made one will cost more in the end than one that can be bought in almost any city, and will never be as satisfactory. In stocking them, use lycopodiums in variety, small-growing ferms, peperennias, begonias and other shade and moleton-dowing plants of moderate growth. Becare not to erowd your plants if you want them to look well. The lycopodiums can be planted after the other plants are in place. Mosess and other native plants can be used. Keep in a shady window.

can be used. Reep in a study window.

Growt.cx.—I have said several times in this department that specimens would not be named, as the naming of a leaf or flower, which A, B, or C may send has no interest for D, E, or F. Notwithstanding this, several persons send specimens which they ask me to name "in the Jouana.;" and one correspondent says I have "so kindly answered her ether queeks, that she knows I won" refuse to answer this one, "I think she will be disappointed. If you have plants that you want in find out the name of, but are not willing to expend two cents in return postage on, don't take the trouble to send them, for yed will be "out," the two cents on your letter of inquiry.

They complain that money was sent the advertisers, but nothing was received in return. De not write to me about those matters. Write to the parties to whose you sent your money. I have nothing whatever to do with the selvertising department, and no one connected with the paper is responsible for failures to receive whatever is ordered from advertisers. I believe, though, still another variety is extalogued, one having striped foliage. All these yearsties have white flowers.

Some Helpful Suggestions for the Family Table

ENGLISH CHOPS AND STEAKS

BY MARY BARRETT BROWN

N England we are accustomed to bestow such care in the preparation of chops and ateaks that they have come almost to be regarded as national dishes, and are met with in almost all English households, cooked to per-fection. It is likely that the methods pursued by your American house-wives are equally as good; still, as we never can know too many good ways of doing a thing, I trust the following well-tested receipts will prove acceptable:

MUTTON CHOPS GRILLED

MUTTON CHOPS GRILLED

Out the chops an inch thick, either from the loin or the best end of the neck; if from the latter, the hones must be shortened a little. Remove all superfluous fat, and season each chop by pressing in a mixture of salt, pepper, and powdered herbs; then dip each chop in warmed butter, and grill on a bot, well-greased griditon, over a clear fire, from eight to ten minutes, according to thickness. During the process of cooking, the chops require to be frequently turned, in order that they may be done equally, and for this purpose use a pair of steak tongs. By inserting any sort of a sharp instrument into meat that is cooking we provide a ready means of escape for the juices which the meat contains, and thus, being deprived of its best element, it becomes dry and tasteless. When cooked, place each chop, just slightly overlapping its neighbor, upon a hot dish; pour over each a dessertspoonful of botting mushroom ketchup, and serve immediately.

CHOPS WITH TOMATO SAUCE

CHOPS WITH TOMATO SAUCE

CHOPS WITH TOMATO SAUCE

A FTER trimming the chops neatly, and seasoning with salt, pepper, and mixed berb powder, dip each one in besten egg, coat with fine bread crumbs, and fry a rich brown on both sides, in a small quantity of clarified fat. When done, pile the chops up high in the middle of a hot dish; surround them with a border of carefully-boiled whole potatoes, rather small and even in size, and pour over all some tomato sauce; sprinkle the surface lightly with finely chopped parsley and tiny patches of sifted egg yolk, and serve very hot.

STEWED MUTTON CHOPS

CUT as many chops as are required, trim them neatly, season with salt and pepper, and brown on both sides just as quickly as possible, either on the gridiron or in a frying-pan. Melt four ounces of butter in a sancepan. Melt four ounces of butter in a sance-pan, then put in two small Spanish onions which have been very thinly sliced, and when these are quite hot lay in the chops; cover-closely, and stew gently until the onions are quite soft. Place in a neat, flat bed of mashed potatoes on a hot dish, and arrange the chops on top; add to the onions a small quantity of mushroom ketchup, or rich brown stock, season according to taste, boil up quickly, possible.

CHOPS WITH POTATOES

CHOPS WITH POTATOES

TOR this purpose choose a shallow tindish of requisite size; butter the inside liberally, fill it two-thirds full with potatoes which have been peeled and very thinly alked, season, moisten with cold water or thin white stock, and place the dish in the hottest part of the oven until the surface of the potatoes is browned. Trim the chops neatly, season them on both sides with salt and pepper, dip them in hot butter, then arrange them on the top of the potatoes, which latter should be entirely covered, and cook in a moderately hot oven. The chops should be turned once, and oven. The chops should be turned once, and when finished should be a crisp brown. If a rather unsightly looking dish must, of neces-sity, be used, arrange round the edge of it, before sending to table, a pretty paper frill, or a table napkin.

STEWED BEEF STEAK

POR stewing, the steak should weigh about f three pounds, and be cut an inch and a half thick; sprinkle it with salt and pepper, lay it in a sauce-pan with two ounces of butter, and brown quickly on both sides over a brisk fire; then cover the meat with good brown stock, and scatter over the surface two tablestock, and scatter over the surface two table-spoonfuls of minced onions, one tablespoonful of powdered herbs, and four large, ripe toma-toes, which have been cut in halves. Cover the pan closely, and stew gently for about an hour and a half. Place it on a hot dish; thicken the sauce if necessary, boil up quickly, and pour it over the ment. Have ready at the same time a well-boiled cautiflower; divide it into small near targies, dist these in holding into small, nent sprigs; dip these in boiling hot butter, sprinkle them lightly with salt, pepper, minced parsley, arrange round the steak, and serve just as hot as possible.

STEAKS WITH MUSHROOM SAUCE

HAVE several small steaks cut, if possible, from the sirloin, each one about three-1.1 from the sirbsin, each one about three-quarters of an inch thick; season well with salt, pepper, minced onion and poudered herbs, and sonk in fine salad oil for an hour, so that the meat may imbibe, to the full, the flavor of the various ingredients. Fry the steaks in a hot frying-pan, then arrange them neatly on a flat bed of mashed potatoes, which have been placed in readiness on a hot dish, and pour over the whole some mushroom sance. Send to table very hot, accompanied, if for luncheon or dinner, by more vegetables in a bot tureen, and more sauce in a sance-boot.

ICING AND DECORATING CAKES

BY MARION WASHBURN

ITH a little care, and a little a fittle care, and a little practice, cakes may be iced and decorated at home as well as at the confectioner's. To do the work successfully, a few general rules must be observed, the eggs to be used must be fresh, and the sugar of good quality, very fine, and free from lumps. It is a good plan to sife the sugar through a fine. a good plan to sift the sugar through a fine sieve before using, and to place the eggs upon ice for an hour or two before you are ready to commence your work. If ornaments are to commence your work. If ornaments are to be used upon the cake, they must be put in place while the icing is moist. Very few utensils are necessary. Bakers use a rubber bag, with graduated nozzle, for flowering and dot patterns, but any one may make a substitute of stiff, white cardboard. Fold a number of square pieces into funnels, fasten with pins, and cut the small end off perfectly true and round. Some may be small, and others large; each should hold two tablespoonfuls of icing.

A thin, broad knife, a bowl of cold water, sugar, gelatine, cucoanut, chocolate, eggs and flavoring will be required, and some fruit col-oring is also of use. The time was when the only icing known was that of the whites of eggs beaten stiff upon a platter and thickened with polverized sugar; and perhaps the old way has not been improved upon as regards looks, but there are cheaper and better tasting icings, warranted not to crack or become sticky.

BONED SCHOOL

BOILED ICING

TAKE one cup of white sugar, two table-spoonfuls of water. Boil until it strings, remove from the fire, and add the white of one egg beaten stiff. Stir all well together, flavor, and cover the cakes when it becomes cool.

CONFECTIONER'S ICING

CONFECTIONER'S ICING

PLACE the whites of three eggs in a bowl, add an equal quantity of cold water, and stir in XXX confectioner's sugar until of the right consistency. Spread over the cakes, and when the first coat is dry fill one of the paper cones, and hold above the cake, with a finger over the small hole to regulate the stream. The icing must be so stiff that it can only be forced through by a gentle pressure above.

Allow it to flow in scallops, dots, or plain lines, as may suit the fancy. A very little practice will enable one to make beautiful patterns. A scroll border may be followed from a stamping pattern if you can trust the eye to follow the lines with any degree of accuracy. A cake is very pretty checked both curacy. A cake is very pretty checked both ways by close lines, and a raisin or tiny drop of crimson jelly may be placed in every small

GELATINE ICING

ONE spoonful of gelatine, two spoonfuls of water; when clear, add one spoonful of hot water and one cup of pulverized sugar. Flavor, and beat well. When nearly cool, spread thickly over the cake.

PLAIN ICING

A PLAIN icing may be made in the same way, using one cup of sugar and two large spoonfuls of water. This is very good when eggs are dear. A caramel cake is very fine put together with the caramel icing, but the layers must all be baked, and everything ready to place together quickly. The icing may be placed over hot water, which will serve to keep it soft.

GLASS ICING

TAKE one cup of light-brown sugar and two spoonfuls of water, a very small spoonful of butter and a few drops of lemon extract. Boil eight minutes, and pour over the cake while hot, spreading it evenly.

CHOCOLATE ICING

TWO cups of sugar and just water enough to moisten. Boil until clear; add two cakes of grated chocolate, and one egg beaten stiff; flavor with vanilla, and beat until cold. After covering a cake with chocolate icing, have ready a cup of English walnuts, shelled, and arrange them over the top in circles.

Daistes may be made of raisins, by placing one with seven around it at intervals over the cake. Raisins may be iced, then dried in the oven, and placed upon the chocolate cake, making a contrast, if desired.

COLORED ICINGS

Pink and white, or "resebud" cake, may be made by icing any white cake with PINK and white, or "rosebud" cake, may be made by icing any white cake with boiled icing, to which a few drops of pink fruit coloring has been added. If this cannot be obtained, take a pinch of cochineal, add a few drops of boiling water, and when cool, strain, and stir a few drops into the icing. It makes a beautiful pink, and, although objectionable to some, I have used it with no bad effect. After icing with the pink, decorate in waves, dots, or circles, with white. Names or dates may be written in this way, and are very may be written in this way, and are very beautiful upon birthday cakes. If fruit coloring can be obtained, very handsome roses, with green leaves, may be designed by a skillful

SOME OTHER DECORATIONS

GRATED eccount may be sprinkled over a pink or yellow cake. Pretty decorations for a white-cake are hearts and diamonds cut from firm currant jelly. The decorations for a webling cake should be, of course, all white. A white cake may be checked with pink chocolate, or yellow lines. One thing to remember in this connection is that no amount of decoration will store for a ready made or of decoration will atone for a poorly made, or a poorly baked, cake.

HALF A DOZEN PILAUS

BY FLORENCE WILSON

HE receipt for a simple pilau is as follows: Crack a knuckle of ham and boil for one hour in three quarts of water, adding one-half teaspoonful of mixed spices, and one large pinch of black pepper. Remove the bone and all bits of fat. Pick carefully and thoroughly; wash (by rubbing between the hands through two waters) a cup of best rice. Boil until the grains are nearly three

Strain through a col-ander until all the liquor is drained off; return to the saucepan, which place uncovered over a slow fire for ten minutes, stirring frequently with a fork. Five minutes before serving sprinkle two tablespoonfuls of cold water over the rice; cover tightly, and remove from stove. In preparing plain rice, follow above direc-tions, using plain, salted water, and leaving out ment, spice and pepper.

CHICKEN PILAU

CHICKEN PILAU

JOINT a half-grown fowl, washing the pieces through three waters, then lightly salting. Lay in a saucepan six slices of good breakfast bacon, two sprigs parsley, one-quarter small onion, chopped fine, good pinch of black pepper. When the fat is thoroughly extracted, remove bacon, and lay in pieces of chicken, cooking until quite done and well browned. Remove meat and parsley, adding three pints of bot water and one pint prepared rice, i. e., washed and picked as in foregoing receipt. When done, but not quite dry, stir loosely with a fork, lay slices of chicken on rice, remove saucepan to the back of the stove, and for twelve minutes let "soak," as our "manners" call the drying process.

SAUSAGE, OR FORCE-MEAT PILAU

IF sausages are used, squeeze from skin and fry in their own grease. If chopped meat, senson well, and fry with six slices break fast bacon; add three pints of hot water and one cup prepared rice. When quite done, stir thoroughly with fork, remove to the back of the stove, leave for five minutes, and serve.

OKRA PILAU

PUT three slices of the indispensable bacom into a saucepan with one quart of okra pods scraped and chopped into tiny bits, discarding heads; pinch of salt and pepper to taste. Stir ten minutes. Add three pints of boiling water, one pint prepared rice. Remove bacon when rice is done, dry on the back of the stove for ten minutes, stirring several times loosely with a fork.

CRAB PILAU

BOIL, for ten minutes, twelve large crabs, salting the water thoroughly. When Boll, for ten minutes, twelve large crabs, salting the water thoroughly. When cold, remove the flesh from body and claws, mix with two tablespoonfuls of butter, several parsley leaves finely chopped, large pinch of black pepper. ### SCIENCE IN COOKING BEEF

If the correspondent who asks how she can have her roast beef brown on the outside and rare and juicy within will put her beef into a very hot oven at first, keeping the temperature as high as three hundred and fifty degrees or more for half an hour, then reducing the heat to about two hundred and fifty degrees for the remainder of the time of cooking, she will attain the desired result. Of course, the meat must be basted as often as every fifteen minutes.

The great heat at first hardens as well as browns the surface of the piece of meat. This keeps in the juices. But if the high temperature be continued, the bardening process goes beyond the surface and the result will be a learn dry and strings piece of meat. hard, dry and stringy piece of mest.

TO CLEAN POINT LACE

REAL point lace must, on no account, be It ironed; it should be pinned on a board covered with fianuel, while still quite wet. Use plenty of pins, choosing very small ones for fine lace, and taking great care to keep the pattern true and even, pinning every part of it out separately. If the lace dries before the process is finished, dampen it with a sponge. For lengths of lace edgings or trimmings, a wooden cylinder should be employed, and the lace pinned around it, keeping the bulk of it folded up in a damp cloth, and uncovering it gradually, as required. Allow the lace to dry thoroughly before taking it off the board.

Machine-made lace may be pulled out with the fingers, pressed with an iron while still damp, pulled again crosswise, and ironed. for fine lace, and taking great care to keep the

YOUNG MEN AND COLLEGE DIPLOMAS

ANY mothers continually write, bewailing the fact that they are incapable of giving their sons the benefits of a college education, and they fear a life of failure in consequence. No fear was ever more groundless. A college training is undoubtedly a valuable adjunct to any young man's life, and where the means of a household allow, it is a mother's best legacy to her son. It will stand him in good stead irrespective of the profession or trade he may enter. But a diploma is not essential to a young man's success. Without it he can make as great a success as with it. Only a small percentage of the most prosperous men of to-day are college graduates. The world of business has proved a far greater college to thousands of young men than have the educational institutions of this country. It has been given to me to have had both college men, and men who have never entered college, associated with me in hardene and the with me in her intered college, associated with me in hungings and this productions. been given to me to have had both college men, and men who have never entered college, associated with me in business, and this experience has led me to the conclusion that if college life and training has helped hundreds of men in the professions, it has also unfitted hundreds of of others for practical business success. A young man with a purpose, and with honesty, energy and willingness harnessed to that purpose, need never fear the lack of a college diploma in his business career. And no mother need feel afraid that her inability to give her son a course in college will retard his business progress. No college ever made a successful business man; he is made by himself and through his own efforts. self and through his own efforts.

SUGGESTIONS TO A GUEST

D<sup>O</sup> not let the old saying, "the first day the man is a guest, the second a burden and the third a pest" be applied to you.

TO PUT INTO A TRAVELING-BAG

By Mrs. S. A. Shaper

RAVELERS alone know the RAVELERS alone know the comfosts of having the necessaries and luxuries of one's toilet arranged both conveniently and daintily, and in these days, when every woman goes a journeying herself or has some friend who does, and to whom she wishes to give some souvenir, hints for a few novelties may be in order:

A DAINTY PIN BOOK.—Take a piece of any strong material, heavy linen, brocade or chamois skin, five and a-half inches by six, and having one end cut into a blunt point. Line with some prettily contrasting colored and having one end cut into a blunt point. Line with some prettily contrasting colored silk or satin, overhanding the edges very neatly, having first, unless brocade is chosen, embroidered the cover with Japanese gold thread or with filoselle. Buy a "book" of English pins, assorted sizes, and tear off the paper wrapping. Place the pins near the bottom of the case, and fold it up so as to hide all but the heads of the pin rows. Thread a darming needle with narrow ribbon, with a long stitch through the cover and the pin rows, fasten them firmly together and the a pretty bow. The them again at each end, and on

A Covered Flask.—The campion bottle, which goes without saying with every tourist, can be made pleasing to the eye by using a small, flat flask, sometimes called a "pumpkin seed" being careful to choose a perfectly small, flat flask, sometimes called a "pumpkin seed," being careful to choose a perfectly smooth, round one. Cut two pieces of chamies skin an inch larger every way than the outline of the bottle, which outline you can easily obtain by the aid of a pencil. Lay the two pieces together, and beginning at the base of the neck pink the leather with a large pinking iron. In each scallop punch a hole with a steel bodkin, and through these lace a narrow old gold ribbon. Into the case thus formed slip the flask, wind the ribbons tightly and often around the neck, and tie them in a smart bow. Cut the leather left at the fop of smart bow. Cut the leather left at the top of the neck into a fringe and allp in a rubber stopper, which, if you choose, you may gild. Paint or embroider a few scattered flowers, or a monogram on the flat surfaces.

A Tasterus Handkenderer Case. one's handkerchief's sadly mussed and untidy is so common an experience of those who trust to pretty sachet holders, that it is pleasant to learn a safer way of carrying them. Cut two squares of heavy cardboard rather longer than a folded moncholy. Cover two of these with pile street and produce the control of these with pile street. these with nile-green satin, under which a heavily-scented layer of cotton wadding has been placed, and two with heavy white linen on which you have embroidered sweet peas, clover, or carnations (or any flower that sug-gests sweet odors), without foliage. When the tops and linings are overcast take them to a shoemaker and have him punch a row of holes across the backs, through which run a nile-green lacing ribbon. Pass a wider ribbon around the whole and tie.

Upon this embroider in a mixture of needle work and ribbon work, a pattern which should suggest the graceful effects of the era just mentioned. A horn of plenty overturned, with roses and leaves falling from it, would with roses and leaves falling from it, would be very appropriate, and bows and trails of narrow ribbon should appear to be tied from month to point of the cornucopia. The rib-bon may be pale blue, and after the bows are tied they should be planed on, and then sewed down with fine running stitches on each edge of the ribbon, which should be absolutely without stiffening. The cornucopia may be cut from cream-colored silk and covered with lace or basket stitch, and then applied to the medallion. The edge of the latter should be medallion. The edge of the latter should be cut into large shallow scallops, and turned ent into large shallow scallops, and turned under and edged with the nacrowest lace. A stiffening of paper or crimdine should be hasted on theback of the satin before the scalloped edge is mixed under.

The abset of wire net, which should be nearly if not quite as broad as the chimney, may then be gilded, and a border of two-inch wide satin ribbon, the color of the countrydece, run on the edge with the corners carefully mixed. The wire may be covered with silver point, if that is preferred to gold. The medallion should then be sewed lightly to the center and the hanging tacked into position center and the hanging tucked into position with small picture frame tacks. If intended as a gift, very small curtoin rings can be sewed to the upper edge to indicate the manner of placing it in position.

SHALL RICH WOMEN WORK?

BY CLARA LANZA

F late years work has become a delightful necessity to some super-ior women. To others it is possibly an irk-some duty, dictated by unsympathetic needs.

But there are women, hundreds of them, to whom work is a mere fad and nothing more. This probably is the direct outcome of the peculiar social condi-tions under which we live, and which have made feminine labor, in the best sense, not made feminine labor, in the best sense, not only facile but honorable.

The poor woman works because she is obliged to do so, or die. The rich woman works for various reasons; sometimes because she fancies herself endowed with an extraordinary talent that it behooves her to exhibit to the world. Then again, she may be animated by a desire to shine in the eyes of her neighbors, or perhaps her education is such that bors, or perhaps her education is such that idleness is a galling restriction and a vague incentive to still vaguer effort. Now and then she has real genius that cannot be stiffed. But in nine cases out of ten the rich woman who works does so from vanity or a desire to who works does so from vanity or a desire to gratify merely a passing whim; or to see her name in print.

Now, the vital question presents itself: In what manner does her co-operation or her competition, as the case may be, affect the labor of her humbler sister whose bitter strug-gle for existence forms at once the most tragic and the most pathetic chapter in the history of our great metropolitan centers. Does the

and the most pathetic chapter in the history of our great metropolitan centers. Does the well-to-do woman's dabbling in this or that employment interfere materially with the opportunities of the poor girl whose work happens to lie in the same direction? In a number of instances it does, and if examples are required we need not go far to find them. Nobody except a prejudiced, narrow-minded higot would venture to deny for a moment that the people of the United States are a nation of money-getters and money worshipers. When our every faculty is not strained in the mad pursuit of dollars and cents we are metaphorically on our knees before those who, more fortunate than ourselves, have accumulated what in vulgar parlance is termed a "pile." A certain deference is paid to wealth everywhere on the face of the earth because it represents power. But in this country defereverywhere on the face of the earth because it represents power. But in this country deference and respectful consideration, too often, become estatic toadyism. Rich people possess every virtue that the strictest code of ethics can inculcate. They are always good-looking, distinguished, clever. Anything that detracts in the smallest degree from their acquirements or their tempers is a slander. On the other hand the poor, like the absent, are invariably in the wrong. There is no merit in poverty, especially if it be honest poverty. Poverty is not a misfortune, it is a positive crime. So we close our doors to the poor and open them to the rich. We slam the golden gates of opportunity in the face of the pauper, deserving or not, and fling them wide apart when we see the carriages of the rich approach. Perhaps this sounds exaggerated. If so, listen.

Personally I know of a young girl, an artist of exquisite refinement and ability, whose pic-tures, though admired, were rejected by a community that made a specialty of purchasing and selling women's work, because a lady who was a member of the committee in charge, painted such trifles herself, and it would never painted cuch trifles herself, and it would never do to take the work of a mere nobody in preference to hers. She was a rich woman and did not need money. The girl was dependent for food and shelter upon the disposition of her panels and sketches, but she was turned away for all that, and curtly informed that her offerings were "not available."

Another philanthropic firm of the same description dismissed an excellent saleswoman for no reason apparently, and when she insisted upon learning the cause that led to her removal she was told in chilling tones: "Yes, we admit that your duties have been performed removal she was told in chilling tones: "Yes, we admit that your duties have been performed in a satisfactory manner, and our sales have increased since you have been here, but you don't dress expensively enough." "How can I on, ten dollars a week?" inquired the girl in dismay. "Ah, that is just it. You can't, of course. That is why we are compelled to dismiss you and take Miss Blank, who has hosts of rich relatives to help her, and give her prefity gowns."

her pretty gowns."

I do not in the least mean to insinuate that I do not in the least mean to insinuate that a woman of wealth must of necessity be frivolous and unsympathetic. I know dozens of rich women who, if they have not the commanding genius of a de Staël have something that nearly approaches it. They work because their inspiration and talent demand an outlet, and to these women I would say continue by all means. They occupy a position that cannot be encreached upon by the feebler sisterhood of any class. Genius, whether it dwell in palace or hovel, is on the same level. But these supreme cases are rare. To rich women whose feible is working at nothing in particular for no reason in particular, I should say: "Step aside; your place is elsewhere. Make room for those whose maintenance depends upon the favors that to you are bambles of no more real value than your last season's clothes."

Speaking in general terms, the proper sphere for women of wealth and leisure is not a utilitarian one, the exceptional cases are exemplified by a superabundance of natural gifts combined with an absorbing love of work. These make labor a necessity. But most women of the cultivated class appear to the best advantage in a purely æsthetic way—as sovereigns of the drawing-room, as skilled mistresses of conversation, as the amateurs whose legitimate fitness to command and adwhose legitimate fitness to command and advise none will dispute. Let these offer kindly assistance to the poor worker, and whisper to the faint heart the inequal word that will bring back the vanished spirit of hope.

This is a plain old-fashioned package compared with the brilliant colorings and startling designs used by our imitators to catch the unthinking buyer. But this package contains the most worthy and desirable face powder that has ever been made-Pozzoni's.

It is refreshing, cleanly, healthful and harmless. A most delicate and desirable protection to the face; in fact, an absolute necessity of the refined toilet in this climate. It is made in three shades, Pure White, Flesh and Brunette, and when rightly used is invisible.

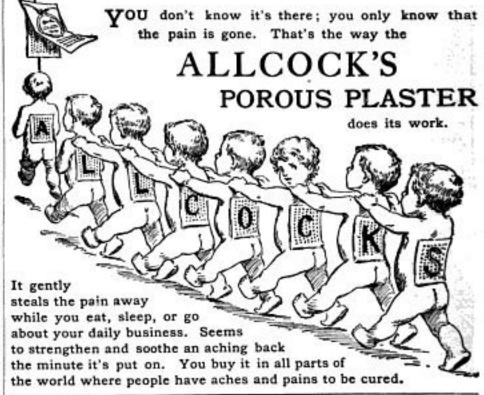

Insist on having Pozzoni's. It has been the standard for 30 years. There a thousand and one imitations, and at many stores you will be offered "something as good as There is no other Complexion Powder as good as Pozzoni's." Pozzoni's. Many imitations are unsafe, some are poisonous.

W.LVERTON-Probably "modern spiritualism" in the United States began at the Fox House, in Hydes-ville, N. Y., in March, 1848, when spirit rappings were first heard. The Fox staters have since confused that aney made these rappings by snapping their great toe. There is nothing whatever in appricabilism; we think we are quite safe in saying that all spiritualists are impos-tors.

Anxious Grat.—The Mangaret Louise House in New York is a Protestant hotel for women. Board cannot be engaged for a longer period than four weeks. Appli-ciation for rooms must be made in advance, and in every case must be accompanied by references. The charges are quite moderate. It is in part supported by the Vandechilt family, and has been liberally endewed by Mrs. Elliot Shepard.

Makino.—It would be impossible for us to advise you as to the number of bridesmalds it would be well for you to have unless we knew something about your circumstances. The number of bridesmalds and usbern is purely optional; of course, the more pretty bridesmalds here are the more beautiful the wedding will be, but elaborate wedding preparadions entail much expense, and cannot be indulged in by everybody.

ETHELYN—Yes, there has recently been founded by some far-seeing women in New York, an institution which proposes to give young women and girls educations which will qualify them as designers of wall papers, carpets, rags, olicious, cretonnes, silks, etc. Heretofore mest of our manufacturers have purchased their designs abroad, not so much from the superiority and originality of the designs offered by foreign artists, as by the mathematical multiness of those offered by designers here who were apt to bring little practicality into their work. Many young girls in the United States have offered bescrifted and original designs but very marely have any of them been correctly drawn, because the would-be designer did not understand the practical side of the work. It is to obviate these deficienties as well as to give young women practical knowledge in the art of designing that this new institution has been established. The course of instruction is divided into the Elementary and the Advanced Departments; the fees are somboal. The teachers are practical men and women who are actually employed in manufactorise or architects offices. Every facility will be given to emake the students to bring their designs before the manufacturers. Prizes will be given to stimulate competition. No fixed period for the course of instruction will be all down. Each pupil will be allowed in proceed as rapidly as she massices each successive step of the art. The school rooms will be at the service of the papils. The idea of a "School of Applied levign" is a recent one, and it remains with the given to stom are counter. the art. The school resum will be at the service of the pupils. The idea of a "School of Applied Beston" is a grand one, and it remains with the girls of this country to make it a success.

HE list of titles which follows, comprises a careful selection of the best books taken from several lines which we have handled for a number of years. We are ready and willing to make an unusual effort to disseminate good, healthy literature, and special arrangements with the publishers permit of our offering really good books at a very low rate,

We think our subscribers will readily discriminate between those we offer and the cheap books with which the market has recently been flooded, most of which are printed from worn-out plates on the poorest of paper and bound in the cheapest manner.

Such as we furnish are handsomely bound in strong, cloth covers, with black and gold stamps. This is a splendid opportunity to secure a first-class library, and for very little money.

Any book in the list following will be sent, postpaid, as a Premium for Two Yearly Subscribers, at $1.00 each. Price, 45 cents each (35 cents for the book and 10 cents additional for postage). Size, 71/2 x 5 inches.

Prescott's narration of one of the most daring events in the world's history, the conquering of a great empire by a mere handful of adventurers, will continue to hold the reader spell-bound by its almost magical power of description as long as books shall be read.

The work includes a life of Cortex. the intrepid conqueror, who quelled the rebellious spirit in his followers by burning his ficet behind him, and a preliminary history of the ancient Mexican civilization. This is the one authentic and comprehensive history of the fall of the Aztoc empire, and has been called "a noble work judiciously planned and admirably executedrich with the spoils of learning."

Price, $1.30. Sent by Express, the receiver to pay the charges.

The writer of "Les Miserables" was one of the most distinguished French writers of the present century.

He has been aptly termed the "Gustave Dore" of literature, for, like this famous illustrator, he excites interest by sudden and startling changes from light to darkness. His style is powerful, vivid and brilliant. "Les Miserables," beyond doubt his greatest work, embraces in its stramatis personer all sorts and conditions of men and women, drawn from all classes of society, and which are faithful representations of the class from which they are drawn. No library is complete without a copy of this most powerful story. Price, $1.85. Must be sent by Express, charges to be paid by the

We can also farnish the same bound in ONE VOLUME, 1500 pages, Full English Cloth, stamped back and sides. The type and illustrations are the same. The price of this book is exceedingly low. Price, 20 cents. Postage and packing, 20 cents extra.

The Set given as a Premium for a Club of 5 Yearly Subscribers at $1.00 euch ; or, for & Subscribers and to cents additional. Price, $1.85. Sent by Express, charges to be paid by the receiver, whether purchased or secured as a Premium,

This, which is perhaps the best and most popular work of this successful novelist, is a story of absorbing interest. The talented writer surrounds his hero with such wonderful adventures and hair-breadth escapes, and his fertile imagination has impelled him to paint so much of the impossible, that the reader is lost in amazement at his skill.

Of course there is a love story in the romance, in fact there are several, and the manner in which they are unfolded forms no inconsiderable part of the great charm of the tale.

The set we offer is full bound in English Cloth, gilt title and top. The type is clear and the printing from new plates. The illustrations are good.

Price, $1.85. Must be sent by Express, charges to be paid by the

We can also furnish the same bound in ONE VOLUME, 650 pages, Full English Cloth, stamped back and sides. The type and illustrations are the same. The price is the most remarkable thing about the book in this form, Price, 90 cents. Postage and pucking, 20 cents extra.

BEN-HUR A Tale of the Christ

BY GENERAL LEW WALLACE

Given as a Premium for a Club of 5 Yearly Subscribers at $1.00 each; or, for 5 Subscribers and 50 cents additional. Price, $1.55. Postage and packing, 15 cents extra, whether purchased or secured as a Premium.

"Ben-Hur" is one of the most popular books issued from the press for years. Everybody is reading, or has read it. It is a most beautiful story, and should be in the homes of Christian families everywhere.

It is one of the best books which could be selected for a holiday or a birthday present.

It is a beautiful Oriental story of the time of Christ. The story in itself is most fascinating, and the vast information it imparts about the people in the Redeemer's time, and the country in which He lived, is of great value.

Price, $1.25. Postage and packing, 15 cents extra.

THE FAIR GOD

Or, the Last of the Tzin's

BY GEN. LEW WALLACE Sent, postpaid, as a Premium for a Club of 5 Yearly Subscribers at $1.00 each; or, for 8 Subscribers and 50 cents additional.

Price, $1.55, postpaid. This book is beyond doubt one of the most powerful historical povels ever written. The tale of the conquest of Mexico is a marvel of artistic finish. The author gives a thoroughly reliable, and at the same time intensely interesting account of the mode of life, domestic, political, religious and mili-tary; as also of the historic course of events during that early period of Spanish fiendishness of which the book treats. Every feature of Aztec civilization necessary to render his task complete, has been carefully studied and grandly set forth.

Price, $1.35, including cost of postage and packing.

LOOKING BACKWARD

Given as a Premium for a Club of 3 Yearly Subscribers at $1.00 each; or, for 2 Subscribers and 25 cents additional. Postage and packing, 10 cents extra. Price, $1.00, postpaid.

This astonishing and fascinating novel is one of the most remarkable books of the nineteenth century. It is undoubtedly a romance of surpassing merit and noble purpose, and the extmordinary effect which this wonderful allegory has had on the public, can be understood by its great success as evinced in the enormous circulation with which it has met, nearly three hundred and fifty thousand copies having been issued.

Price, $1.00, postpaid.

RAMONA

BY HELEN HUNT JACKSON Sent, postpaid, as a Premium for a Club of 5 Yearly Subscribers at $1.00 each; or, for & Subscribers and 25 cents additional; or, for 5 Subscribers and 50 cents additional. Price, $1.25, postpaid.

A famous book by a famous author. Everybody reads "Ramons," and large editions have been sold. This is the book that made Mrs. Jackson famous. Since her death it has been read by thousands. The story is laid in Southern California. Ramona, a child of the Santa Barbara Mission, and Alessandro, & native Indian sheep-shearer, are the hero-

The adventure is very thrilling, the descriptions of scenery graphic and true, and the moral noble and instructive.

The book will interest all ages. Nearly 500 pages. Cloth-bound.

Price, $1.25, postpald.

DRIFTING ROUND THE WORLD

Sent, postpaid, as a Premium for a Club of & Yearly Subscribers at $1.00 each; or, for 2 Subscribers and so cents additional. Price, as cents. Postage and packing, 15 cents extra.

This book is fairly alive with helpful adventures and wonderful escapes. It records the travels and adventures of a young lad who finds that a voyage on a Cape Ann schooner bound to Greenland, is the first opening in the way of self-support. As a matter of course, he is shipwrecked on the Coast of Labrador, and before he again sees the New England shore, Iceland, Scotland, England, France, Holland, Russia and Asia are all interviewed by him, as they only can be by a wide-awake Yankee boy with an inquiring mind.

We know of no book that will give the young a better idea of the customs and habits of these nations.

The book is bound in Cloth and is profusely illustrated. Contains 206 pages and 154 illustrations

Price, $1.00, including cost of postage and packing.

PERSEVERANCE ISLAND Or, The Robinson Crusoe of the 19th Century

Bent, postpoid, as a Premium for a Club of & Yearly Subscribers at $1.00 each; or, for 2 Subscribers and 50 cents additional. Price, $1.15, postpaid.

The history of the life and adventures of a Yankee "Crusoe," cast away alone on a desolate island in the Pacific, and all his shipmates lost.

Our old friend "Robinson Crusoe was a bungler in comparison with this modern specimen, and the young reader will be not only entertained, but instructed, in its chapters.

How he prepared fresh water, how he made gunpowder, lucifer matches, edged tools, built houses and boats, is graphically told in these pages.

Profusely illustrated, bound in Cloth-colors and gold. 372 pages. Price, $1.15, postpaid.

WINNING HIS WAY BY CHARLES CARLETON COFFIN

Sent, postpaid, as a Premium for a Club of 5 Yearly Subscribers at $1.00 each ; or, for 2 Rubscribers and 25 cents additional. Price, $1.00, postpaid.

This remarkably interesting book, which for so long maintained its place as a prime favorite with all the boys, was for a considerable time out of print. The one we offer is a new edition issued to meet the large demand. It contains 208 pages and twentyone entirely new full-page illustrations. Size, 634x834 inches. Price, $1.00, postpaid.

JED

A Boy's Adventure in the Army of "'61-'65" BY WARREN LEE GOSS

Given as a Premium for a Club of 4 Yearly Subscribers at $1.00 each. Postage and packing, 10 cents extra. Price, $1.50, postpaid.

Of all the many stories of the Civil War that have been published, we cannot think of one which, for sturdy realism and intensity of interest, can compare with "Jed."

It is a wholesome war story told by a soldier; a spirited, manly and useful book. There is inspiring patriotism but no marring bitterness. There is a serious tone and purpose running through this book which can be commended heartly alike for its facts and its high principles. Price, $1.50, including cost of postage and packing.

SIX LITTLE REBELS

BY MRS. KATE TANNATT WOODS

Bent as a Premium for a Club of 3 Yearly Subscribers at $1.00 each; or, for & Subscribers and $5 cents additional. Postage and packing, 10 cents extra. Price, $1.00, postpaid.

This is a story of boys and girls during the first years of our Civil War. Five of the "little rebels," the motherless sons of a rich Southerner, were sent from Richmond to Washington, and placed under the guardianship of a good doctor there. The sixth "little rebel" is a colored boy who accompanies the children. The characters are finely drawn-fresh and natural as a June morning-and a finer group of children would be hard to reproduce in any part of the world. Boys and girls could hardly have that great chapter in our history, whose events they are too young to remember, more truthfully and interestingly told than it is in this unpretending little story. The fact is, the story reads like a record of actual life, and not a story at all. Cloth-gilt and silver stamps, over 400 pages, thoroughly illustrated.

Price, $1.00, including cost of postage and packing.

THE LIGHT OF ASIA BY SIR EDWIN ARNOLD

Sent, postpaid, as a Premium for a Club of 3 Yearly Subscribers at $1.00 each ; or, for s Subscribers and 25 cents additional.

Price, $1.00, postpaid. This work, by which its talented author is best known, is a poem on the life of the sup-posed founder of the Boddhistic religion.

Few can fall to be stirred by the story of the noble self-denial, the devotion, the mpt holiness of this Indian teacher, who, so long ago, seemed in so much to have anticipated the purer doctrines of our own Caristianity. It is a poem of lustrous and finished texture, abounding in picturing force by a writer richly endowed with the power of expression and with a musical instinct. Price, $1.00, including cost of postage and packing.

QUEECHY (One Volume) THE WIDE, WIDE WORLD (One Volume)

Either one of these books given as a Premium for a Club of & Yourly Subscribers at $1.00 each; or, for 2 Subscribers and 50 cents additional. Postage and packing, 15 cents extra. Price, $1.40 each, postpaid, Elizabeth Wetherell, like Miss Alcott, seems never to grow out of the affections of the rising generations. Delighting us when we were children, she delights our children now in their day. With all the changes of custom which time makes, her books are as eagerly sought now as they were when literature for growing minds was not as plentiful as it now She never grows oldfashioned, and the girl of to-day laughs and weeps with the heroines of "Queechy" and "The Wide, Wide World" as did the girl of thirty years ago. They are both simple, natural, true-hearted tales that appeal to the sympathies of all ages and at all times. These books were formerly published in two volumes each; we now offer each story complete in one volume.

Price, $1.40 each, including cost of postage and packing.

THE PRETTY SISTER OF JOSÉ BY FRANCES HODGSON BURNETT

Sent, postpaid, as a Premium for a Club of 3 Yearty Subscribers at $1.00 each; or, for 2 Subscribers and 25 cents additional.

This story by the world-famous author of "Little Lord Fauntleroy" is a striking illustration of the author's versatility.

The scene of the romantic tale is laid in Madrid, and the principal characters are Spaniards of the humbler class. Pepita-known among the gallants who flock around her as "the pretty sister of Jose"-is a country girl whose pride, wilfullness, imperious temper, and beauty, get her finally into sorry trouble, making an uncommonly interesting story. Price, $1.00, postpaid.

SARA CREWE

Or, What Happened at Miss Minchin's

BY FRANCES HODGSON BURNETT

Given as a Premium for a Club of 5 Yearly Subscribers at $1.00 each; or, for 2 Subscribers and 25 cents additional. Postage, 15 cents extra. Price, $1.00, postpaid.

This beautiful story bids fair to rival the author's famous "Little Lord Fauntleroy" in popularity-and another child has been added to English fiction. The tale is filled an exquisite pathos and sweetness. Louise Chandler Moulton said: "Everybody was in love with Little Lord Fauntleroy, and I think all the world, and the rest of mankind, will be in love with 'Sara Crewe.' The tale is so tender, so wise, so human, that I wish every girl could read it."

Price, $1.00, postpaid.

This is a series of letters addressed to a wealthy Jew in Egypt, by his daughter, supposed to be sojourning in Jerusalem in the days of Herod, and relating, as if by an eye witness, all the scenes and wonderful incldents in the life of Jesus of Nazareth. This volume was written for the purpose of presenting, perhaps in a new aspect and in a new point of view, the advent of the Son of Mary among the people of Juden.

There can be no charge of irreverence where none is intended, and where, with sacred awe and a deep reverence, the writer has trod " with his shoes off his feet," and with the most cautious steps. It is of much more absorbing interest than

THE BOOKS OF THE BIBLE Briefly Analyzed

This work of Professor Schultze is the Bible in a nut-shell, as it were. It is a comprehensive and succinct epitome of the Bible. It contains in a very small compass a comprehensive view of the various books contained in the Holy Scriptures. It is specially designed for use by Bible students and Sunday-school teachers. Every Bible render should own a copy. A recommendation of this book to one of our correspondents through our column of "Literary Queries," produced such a large and unexpected demand for copies from all parts of the conntry we have been led to incorporate it in our list of books. Price, 20 cents, including cost of postage and packing.

WEBSTER'S PRACTICAL DICTIONARY

Given for 3 Yearly Subscribers at $1.00 each; or, for 2 Subscribers and 25 cents additional. Price, 75 cents, postpaid. (This price in low.

Webster's Practical is a new work by the editors and publishers of Webster's Unabridged, and contains more than twice the amount of matter and illustrations ever before offered for the price. 600,000 words and nearly 1500 firstclass illustrations in Webster's Practical.

It embodies several new feafures which, for ordinary use, render it pre-eminent among dictionaries, not excepting even the Unabridged.

The importance of supplying every child with Webster's Practical for his very own is not generally appreciated. As an educator it is worth many times its price, and a little selfdenial to provide one or more copies in the family will prove, later on in life, to have been a wise and most profitable investment. We have used this book in very large quantities, and we are glad to say it is one of our most popular premiums.

It is handsomely bound in Cloth with ornamental covers. The paper is of good quality and the type is clear. Our price is but 75 cents, which includes cost of postage and packing.

INFORMATION FOR AUTHORS

Sent, postpaid, as a Premium for a Club of 3 Yearly Subscribers at $1.00 each; or, for 2 Subscribers and 25 cents additional. Price, $1.00, postpaid.

This is a volume of considerable interest and value to writers. The information which concerns the preparation of manuscripts for the press, the modes of disposing of them, and the prices likely to be received, is addressed particularly to beginners in literary work, and repeuts many familiar rules, but it may also be profitably read by those of more experience. Regarding this book it has been aptly said, that if editors knew what was good for them selves they would send a copy to all literary aspirants under twenty-one.

Price, $1.00, including cost of postage and packing.

PERIODICALS THAT PAY CONTRIB-UTORS

Sent, postpaid, as a Premium for a Club of 3 Yearly Subscribers at $1.00 each; or, for 2 Subscribers and 25 cents additional. Price, $1.00, postpaid.

The author of this book, Eleanor Kirk, ranks as one of the best-informed women in the country, and is probably the best-known newspaper correspondent in New York City, Everything she writes is interesting.

In this book she furnishes a very complete list of newspapers and magazines of the United States that pay for contributions, what kind of articles are most acceptable, length of article desired, and the name of the person to be addressed on each paper, and whether the paper pays for poetry or not. It is of the greatest advantage to all who intend to adopt literature as a profession,

Price, $1.00, including cost of postage and packing.

HANDBOOK OF PUNCTUATION

Sent, postpaid, as a Premium for 2 Yearly Subscribers at $1.00 each. Price, 50 cents, postpaid.

No one who writes, or teaches the art of writing, should be without this book, for no other presents in such a clear and concise form the rules to guide one in the art of punctuation. It is written by one of large experience in this specialty, and embraces the improvements in Composition, Proof-Reading, and Punctuation that have recently come into use. It contains everything pertaining to manuscript-writing and newspaper and bookmaking. It was prepared, as the author states, " for the use of printers, authors, teachers and scholars." It can hardly fail to be of substantial service to every one among the classes addressed who will attentively use it. Price. 50 cents, including cost of postage and packing,

EASE IN CONVERSATION

BY EMMA C. HEWITT

HOW TO TALK WELL AND IMPROVE YOUR GRAMMAR We have sent out nearly ten thousand copies of this most popular conversational guide, which we can thoroughly recommend. It is written in an easy, chatty style which differs very materially from the ordinary books of this class. Unsuspected errors in everyday English are pointed out. Those whose earlier education may have been neglected, will appreciate the advantage to be derived from a perusal of this collection of hints to the Ungrannaticalungrammatical. By Mar Earlaw Colourith ... 3 jagociate talton dophie Ladig Hone Jo

The acquisition of case and correctness in conversation is placed within reach of the render, and those who are classed as " poor talkers" may talk well-those who have stready the ability to converse well, and without difficulty, can improve.

THE FINEST GIFT BOOKS ISSUED THIS YEAR

ANY BOOK, AND THE MUSIC AND WORDS OF THE SONG, SENT FOR 2 YEARLY SUBSCRIBERS. CASH PRICE, 50 CENTS EACH, POSTPAID.

Who does not recognize the songs which made Stephen C. Foster world-famous? "Nellie Was a Lady", "Swance River". "My Old Kentucky Home", and "Massa's in de Cold, Cold Ground". Will re is there a collection of verses to match them for simplicity and pathetic beauty?

There is something inexpressibly sweet and tender about these old Southern ballads and their melodies, and to those who have heard them softly erooned at eventide—their music plucked on the guitar or banjo—these songs of other days will never die.

Early last spring we started out to secure the best line of Gift Books published. Failing to find one which was entirely satisfactory, we decided to have one which should be made especially for our own use-one which should exactly sult our purpose. We are more than satisfied with the result.

The books we offer measure 7 x 9 inches. The covers are beautifully illuminated in six rich colors. The binding is in padded imi tation of Silk Rep. The wording of the Songs is engraved, and on every page in each book there is an illustration one half of them being full-page. The drawings for them were made by Copeland, and they are the most artistic illustrations that have ever been issued in this The heavy enameled paper and the press work is the best we could secure. With each book is included the Complete Words and Music of the Song.

We will send, postpaid, any one book as a Premium for 2 Yearly Subscribers at $1.00 each. The price will be 50 cents each postpaid The bookstores will have nothing equal to them at any such price

LITTLE LORD FAUNTLEROY BY FRANCES HODGSON BURNETT

Given as a Premium for a Club of a Yearly Subscribers at $150 each; or, for & Subscribers and 50 cents additional. Price, $1.75, postpaid.

Little Master Fauntleroy, a little American boy, suddenly discovers himself heir to a title in England. As he has been rather opposed to English aristocracy (owing to the teaching of his bosom friend, the groceryman at the corner) he finds it a little difficult to reconcile his sudden elevation to his sensitive conscience, but finally sails for England contented, upon his mother's assurance that it is "all right.

The wise devotion of a widowed mother to an only son; the love and loyalty returned by that son to his devoted mother, are beautifully and naturally portrayed. It is a simple, sweet story, gracefully told, which no one can lay down without feeling better for having read it. If you have not a copy of this work, you should have. Price, $1.75, p ostpaid.

GIOVANNI AND THE OTHER

(FRANCES HODGSON BURNETT'S LAST BOOK)

Sent, postpaid, as a Premium for a Club of 5 Yearly Subscribers at $1.00 each ; or, for 3 Subscribers and 50 cents additional. Price, $1.50, postpaid.

In this new volume there is a certain unity growing out of the fact that the tales, with one or two exceptions, are about little people whom Mrs. Burnett has known. Four of the stories are about little Italian walfs who crept into the author's heart; two are of incidents in the lives of Mrs. Burnett's own boys. They all reveal that magic charm in the delineation of child life, the secret of which Mrs. Burnett alone seems to possess. There are nine full-page attractive

PANELS IN OIL

Many students in the great art schools of Munich partially provide for their expenses by painting small pictures in oil otom on panel. These are engerly seized by exporters at very low pelces brought to this country, framed and sold. We have secured a quantity. Our space will not permit of illustrations showing the subjects-in fact, no newspaper cut could do justice to these little gems. The price is $1.25 men. They garrie sail by charge ogle application. The supply is limited and will soon run out.

A FEW FACTS RELATIVE TO THE STAMPING OUTFITS WE OFFER

In the first place, we make our own Outfits. The patterns are the work of designers who are here in our workrooms the year round, and who work for no one else. They are men of experience who, Inspecting the sketches and samples of new work and novel ideas constantly coming to us for examination, have every facility for keeping thoroughly posted in fancy-work ideas.

The perforating is done by our own operatives, on machinery built after our own designs. The paper is the best and highest priced obtainable. The advantages of all this will be apparent to those who know that the great majority of Stamping Outlits advertised are mailed for the advertiser by one of a number of people who make this their business, the same Outfit being frequently sent out for various concerns under as many attractive names. We do not send our orders out to other people to be filled with what they may choose to send.

IN SELECTING AN OUTFIT

from our list, choice should be determined by the suitability of the patterns, as described, and the size and character of the work in view. Many advertisements lay particular stress upon the number of sheets or the number of patterns offered. It is disappointing to find that "a sheet" is oftentimes a very small one, and that many of the designs are so small and thickly grouped as to be practically uscless; that an alphabet goes to make up the number as "26 designs," etc. Consult our measurements of the patterns as given.

ARTISTIC DESIGNS.

A comparison of all the Stamping Outfits sold, convinces us that our sets of patterns include a class of designs of a conventional character which is not elsewhere to be found in Outfits.

PAINTING AND DESIGNING.

Very many of the patterns are adapted for outlining for Kensington and Lustra Painting and general designing.

MONEY CAN BE MADE.

We have filled a great many orders for ladies who, by keeping on hand a variety of new, fresh designs and the necessary materials, are able to do Stamping for their friends at very moderate rates and at the same time derive considerable income. Stamping as furnished by Fancy Goods stores is expensive, and frequently the stock designs are old and backneyed.

THE PRICES.

Notice the prices of our Outfits. By making and mailing our own Outfits, employing skillful hands and perfected machinery, expecting but a reasonable profit, and turning out many thousands of patterns every day, we are enabled to offer at a lower figure Outfits of considerable more intrinsic value than those known as " JIGANTIC " BOLLAR OUTFITS, ETC.

SPECIAL OFFER,—To any one reactions of for each one of our perforated Pattern Stamping Outfits, and inclosing, with the order, 15 cases additional, we will mail, postpaid, a copy of Jenny June's "Manual of Ladies' Fancy Work," in the New and Revised Edition, giving designs and plain directions for all kinds of fancy needlework. 700 illustrations. Price of Jenny June's "Manual of Fancy Work," when purchased alone, 56 cents, postpaid.

ROPE-SILK STAMPING OUTFIT

Bent, postpaid, as a Premium for 2 Yearly Subscribers at $1.00 each. Price, 75 cents, postpaid.

There are a number of special features about this Outfit which cannot be found in any other.

THE PATTERNS

Are unusually large. The sheets measure (with two exceptions) 22 x 14 inches-the designs correspond in size. The details follow: 18 x 8 inches. Large conventional design, for border.

14 x 8 outlining, suitable for head rest or border.

outline

These designs are all conventional and are most artistic. They are intended to be worked in rope-silk or couching silk, the finer lines being drawn in with outline silks.

STAMPING PATTERNS, INSTRUCTIONS AND A WORKING-MODEL COMBINED

We placed at the disposal of a professional expert in shading and blending of colors, a line of 800 shades and grades of the best washsilks. This lady embroidered the various designs in this Outfit so as to skillfully produce the best and most artistic results

With each Rope Silk Stamping Outfit, we send a lithographed sheet, on which are reproduced all the designs; all the shadings and blendings are plainly indicated in an ingentous manner.

Any lady ordering a Stamping Outfit can, if she prefer, use the patterns in the ordinary way. If she can purchase at home the best goods; if she can find new and desimble colors and knows just how many skeins are required in the different grades to work each design, our sheet of designs would be of no interest to her. To those who cannot, we offer;

A COMPLETE EMBROIDERING OUTFIT OF THE BEST SILK

for working any one of the designs in the Outfit; just enough silk to embroider the pattern selected-no more.

Any lady who knows how to thread a needle can take the silk we send, and-by using as a guide the sheet of designs, and the instructions regarding the various stitches to be employed-produce a piece of embroidery equal to anyone who has, by reason of years of experience, reached the highest attainments in this branch of Decorative Art. Each skein of silk is tagged with the shade number, and no mistake need be made. We have the various assortments made up, ready to send out on order. The prices of the different Outfits are given on a list inclosed with the Stamping Patterns, and are lower than those for which the same grades of silk could be secured elsewhere.

As explained above, those who can secure, nearer home, the silk and shades desired, and who know just what they want, just how much is needed, and the proper stitches to be employed, can order the Stamping Patterns and use their own judgment and materials. Powder and distributer: point, brush, and instructions for stamp-ing by the wet and dry processes, included.

FAST COLOR EMBROIDERING SILKS

We assume it to be unnecessary to call special attention to a fact which has in the last three years been thoroughly demonstrated to the satisfaction of such of our subscribers as are interested in slik embroidery and needlework; the fact that the silk we use is the best which can be procured.

We wish simply to state that we shall continue to fill such orders as we receive for Wash-Color Silks with the same class of goods we have always used, and which we believe to be equal, and, in the great majority of cases, superior to any others manufactured.

We have facilities for purchasing these goods on terms equally advantageous with the largest wholesale dealers and jobbers in this country, and we supply them to our subscribers accordingly. Those familiar with the prices of Embrokiering Bliks, as they are sold in the stores, should compare our prices with those at which silks are usually offered. We think any difference in price will be found to be in our favor; any difference in the quality of the goods must necessarily be so.

SILKS PURCHASED OF US Should be ordered only under the following conditions:

That should be selected only by our Shade Numbers, as shown in

mar No stike will be exchanged!

Therefore do not order unless you know exactly what you wish. NO CASH ORDER amounting to less than 25 cents can be received. Take into consideration the expense of maintaining a large and complete line of the time necessary to shade and blend the goods in filling orders, and the cost of sample cards, and it will be apparent that the margin of profit on orders for less than twenty-five (25) cents would not pay us for the time and trouble involved.

IN SELECTING SHADES

Order them only by numbers and as taken from our Sample Book, which is complete and accurate. The price of the Book, including poetage, is five cents. (Considerably less than it costs to make.)

Do not send goods to be matched. Do not attempt descriptions of colors and blendings. The Sample Book is all you will need.

ROPE SILK

PULL-LENGTH SKEINS

The heaviest thread employed in embroidery—now so well known as to hardly require an explanation-is an exceedingly heavy, rather loose-twisted silk, probably the most popular and effective goods used to-day in Art Needlework.

ORIENTAL EMBROIDERY SILK

One Ounce sent, postpaid, as a Premium for 2 Yearly Subscribers at $1.00 each. Price, 50 cents, postpaid.

We offer this as the cheapest form of buying the best quality of Embroidering Silk in skeins. The same quality, as sold in retail stores, would cost from 95 cents to $1.00 an ounce. The colors are assorted, and are all fine rich shades. The quality is of the best, and is pure fibre slik. We have it put up for us at a large silk mill, and as each thread is laid in straight—the fall length—we are enabled to buy and offer it low-as we do not have to pay for the expensive skeining and knotting, which must all be done by hand. This is regular Skeln Embroidery silk, assured colors, but of regular lengths, only it is in one large hank, and not in small knotted skeins.

It will be impossible for us to assert any particular colors or shades. We can only send it out assorted, and just as received from the factory.

We will guarantee the quality to be first-class.

Price, 50 cents, postpaid.

KNITTING SILK

MADE FROM THE LONG FIBRE OF REELED COCOONS

One Ounce (2 Balls) sent, postpaid, as a Premium for a Club of 3 Yearly Subscribers at $1.00 each. Price, 35 cents per buil, postparid.

There are two kinds of Knitting Slik. One is made of the refuse of partially unwound or imperfect cocoons. The fibre-being so short they cannot be recled-are carded and then span like cotton. The result is the dead, justreless, soft and spongy appearance which characterizes much of the knitting silk sold. Articles made of this poor stuff will have but little lustre (what little they have will soon disappear), and with a little handling will become dull and faded, as though made of cotton, and will soon get all out of shape, and wear sut. We carry a stock of the strong, clastic, lustrons Silk made from perfect, continuous fibre silk. It has been proven (by reason of actual experiment in tests of articles made up and worn) to be of the best quality. The dyes are all Fast Colors and will not stain the flesh when worn as mittens, hostery, etc.

NEW DESIGNS IN LINEN SPLASHERS

Any 2 Splashers sent, postpaid, as a Premium for 2 Yearly Subscribers at $1.00 each. Price, 25 cents each, postpaid.

We probably use a greater number of Splashers than any other retail house in the country. Each season we select from a large assortment of designs which are submitted to us such as are most likely to meet the popular taste. Lack of space this season prevents our displaying, as we have done heretofore, a complete assertment of stamped designs, of which, this year, we have two dozen; they are all good, and will be sure to please.

The Splashers are of linen, fringed at the bottom and both ends, and measure 30 x 20 inches.

Price, 25 cents each, including cost of postage and packing.

GRIFFIN AUTOMATIC RUG MACHINE

Sent, postpoid, as a Premium for a Gub of 8 Yearly Subscribers at $1.00 each. Price, 75 cents, postpaid.

This is by far the best Rug machine manufactured. A child can do good work with it. It has a tubular needle and, as the rag or yarn is carried down through the buriap, friction is entirely assisted. The machine may be guided in a circle, or upon any angle, as conventently as in a straight line. The feed is automatic, and the length of loops, or stitch, may be chauged at any time. The loops being of uniform length no shearing is necessary. For a practical machine for drawing in rags, this is superior to any other.

The needle we send is intended for general work, with rags, or with-Germantown or curpet-yarn; but when it is considered desirable to work yarn exclusively, we recommend a smaller needle, which we will farnish, with looper, for fifteen conts.

Our price, of the Rug-maker 75 cents, postpaid. Price, elsewhere, $1.00, and postage extra.

Given as Premium for a Club of & Yearly Subscribers at $1.00 each; or, for 2 Rubscribers and 50 cents additional. Postage and Packing, 15 cents extra. Price, $1.55, postpaid.

This story originally appeared as a serial in The Christian Union. It abounds with stirring Incidents presented in the author's vigorous style. The description of social life in the West as depirted will seem burdly real to those who know the country now; but the writer. growing up from early bepliced familiar with the strange wild life around him, wrote from personal experience. ### MARY F. KNAPP'S FANCY-WORK BOOKS

(RELIABLE PATTERNS Nos. 1 and 2)

Either one sent, postpaid, as a Premium for the name of one new Subscriber (not the Bender's) at $1.00. Price, either volume, 25 cents, postpaid.

Mary F. Knapp's "Reliable Patterns for Knitting and Crocheting" consist of two books, each devoted to a distinct purpose.

BOOK No. 1 starts out with an explanation of terms used in knitting and crocheting, and then proceeds to describe the various stitches used in the designs which follow:

Stitches given are Afghan or Tricot, Star, Raspberry, Spider-1, 2 and 3; Crazy, and Twisted Leaf.

Nine different varieties of bed-quilts are described; seven for knitting and two for crocheting. These are followed by directions for making gent's knitted undershirt; lady's undervest, with high neck and long sleeves; infant's longsleeved, high-necked shirt; knitted buby shirt; child's leggings and drawers combined; lady's knitted leggings (with gore in the Ruce); knitted slippers, bed-secks, Polish boots; comfort socks, baby's boot, socks with shell tops, baby's shoo, infant's carriage sock, crochet infant's sock, infant's boot, sock in star-stitch, baby boot, crochet wavy skirt (lovely and warm for winter); two knitted skirts, three knitted jackets, crochet shoulder cape, breakfast shawls, crocheted and knitted; cloud, head in starstitch, infant's hood, new boaded hood, Mother Hubbard hood, toboggan cap; Tam O'Shanter cap, plain and wave pattern; seven varieties of bubbes' sacks; infants' band garters; side elastics; coucreste or afghan for baby; strips for lounge afghan; crochet square for afghan; gentlemen's scarfs; seven styles of knilted mittens, besides those for children and the knilted gloves for gentlemen: wristlets; three levely designs for collars; knitted and crocheted purses, unusually pretty; butterfly table-mats, tidy in railroad knitting; shell, apple-leaf and horn-of-plenty tidy; pop-corn and wheel tidy; crochet chemise band, the best design ever published; slumberole and head-rest; lambrequin, match-receiver; handsome macremé waste-basket; cornucopia in crochet work; pansy and calla mats; hammock and horse-nets, head and body combined. Book No. 1 contains one hundred and one designs, all desirable patterns. Price, 25 cents, postpaid.

BOOK No. 2 repeats the explanations of terms used in knitting and erocheting, and then follow seventy-seven designs for knitted edgings, and forty-four designs for crochet trimming. Special pains have been taken in preparing these directions that every one shall be correct, and every one is a thing of beauty. Scarcely a book has ever been published that is thoroughly reliable, but Miss Knapp has personally worked out every pattern in her collection, and they are absolutely correct.

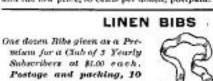

The patterns given are for Spanish lace, French lace and insertion, clover-leaf edging, palm-leaf trimming, with its insertion; diamond edging, oak-leaf, crazy lace, varieties of edges for counterpane border; Tunisian lace and insertion; rose, paim and oak-leaf edges; Mikado, Newport and and deep shell lace, all of which are very destruble and lovely patterns. Besides these are the diamond Normandy lace, apple-leaf, Smyrna, cane leaf, rose-leaf and English-point patterns; a beautiful design called the crochet ptn-wheel lace; nets for horses' ears, and numerous crochet edges, very bandsome, yet without any special name to distinguish them; pineapple edge, which is particularly ornamental frimming for underwear, with, or without, its accompanying insertion; beautiful fan lace; designs for the novelty braids now so popular; as well as the feather-edge and rick-rack braids; Roman key or Greek pattern, and many other designs which Miss Knapp claims are not found in other books of similar character. Any one fond of knitting and crecibeting will find in this new edition of Book No. 2, an invaluable assistant in adorning both the home and wardrobe. Price, 25 cents, postpaid.

came to be written. When Miss Alcott was very young she tried all her powers in an ambitious novel which made no remarkable impression; later, being advised to write a home story for girls, she took her sisters and herself for heroines, and made of their simple life this tale which, long ago, carried all hearts by storm.

You ought to have a copy of "Little Women." If you have one in the house it is sure to be pretty nearly worn out.
